Here I wish to call the attention of the Senate to a most remarkable argument of the Senator from Tennessee. He told us that at the last session of Congress the House voted, in Committee of the Whole—ayes 85, noes 47—to give this notice; and that that proposition was only rejected in the Senate by a vote of seventeen to fifteen. But when the very same Senate came together at this session, during the early weeks of the session, with the same bill standing over, there was not a single man in the Senate to demand the yeas and nays on postponing it indefinitely. The vote and the feeling on that point were unanimous. The honorable Senator from Virginia [Mr. MASON] made an argument to show that that bill contained a plain violation of the contract made with one of the companies; and yet, sir, it is argued here to-day against this measure that the House passed that by a vote of, ayes 85, noes 46, plainly violating what the honorable Senator from Virginia demonstrated was the contract with another company and arbitrarily giving the notice in this case. As I said before, when the Senate came together at this session, on fully and calmly reviewing the subject, that bill went by the board without a single objection. Now, is it not well to consider that the country was saved from such results—saved by the pertinacity of individual Senators here, suffering at the time, perhaps, somewhat in the opinion of their colleagues on this floor in resisting such a violatiation? What has now happened? The same House of Representatives has reconsidered the question, and the Senator thinks it most extraordinary that that House has, by seventeen majority, passed this bill, not only refusing to give the notice, but absolutely doing away with the power of Congress to give it without a reason. To my mind, the inference to be drawn from that is very different from what the Senator from Tennessee seemed to indicate. I say "seemed" to indicate, because he said he did not propose to inquire into the motives of anybody. Now I regard it as a careful review by the House of Representatives, and a change, radical and total, from an unathorized and unwise act, to a sound and sensible conclusion.

Sir, there has not been a measure before Congress which has not been—and I feel myself authorized to state from what I have seen here, that there will never be a measure before Congress which will not be—in some way affected by this power to give notice. It is impossible that it should be otherwise in the nature of things. Such is the feeling of the country, and that feeling is carried into both Houses of Congress, that when this line is attacked by outsiders, as it is, and undue influences are brought to bear on members of Congress, that attack is resisted. The consequence is, that parties are organized in Congress, they are thoroughly organized, for and against this arbitrary act. To gather strength, they do what everybody always does in Congress, that is, to make one question operate upon another, to rally just as much strength as you can. It turns out, therefore, that the whole legislation of the country is affected by the question of whether this notice shall be given or not. I wish to see it put out of the way. I have had too many measures crushed by it—measures in which my State was largely interested; I have seen, too, many other measures crushed by it. Sir, this power, which, as I said, is useless for good, which never can be exercised, is only kept here for the purpose of mischief. Then, on this point, we find that the Government of the United States is as much interested as the company is in doing away with this useless reservation.

Now, sir, I wish to say a few words in this connection as to the effect of this contract upon the Navy, because I think it the most important branch of the subject; and I thought so at the time when I voted for this increased compensation in 1852. What were the facts? Why, sir, every naval vessel which we had afloat on the waters was, for sion, therefore, to modify the amendment by leaving the appropriation as it stands, and simply to strike out the provision taking away the power to give notice.

There being no objection the amendment was so modified.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. FOOT.) The question is on the amendment of the Committee as modified, to strike out the words which have been read.

Mr. HUNTER. Mr. President, the amendment of the Committee on Finance is designed to preserve to the Government the power to give notice to Mr. Collins and his company for the purpose of putting an end, whenever Congress shall think proper, to the extra allowance. It is designed to keep this power in the hands of Congress. For myself, I think we ought to go further. Individually I should be for giving the notice; but the committee only reported an amendment which was designed to keep it within the power of Congress hereafter to give the notice whenever they shall think proper to do so. It seems to me so eminently proper, that I need say nothing in reference to it.

Mr. BADGER. Mr. President, I am, for one, not for concurring in the amendment proposed by the Committee on Finance. I am not for retaining in the Government this power of giving notice to which my friend from Virginia has referred. To me the propriety of what the Committee on Finance propose is not so clear as it seems to be to him. If I understand the provision sent to us from the House, it is to continue this contract to the end of the time for which it was originally made, at the increased rate of allowance which was carried through both Houses of Congress two or three years ago. I am in favor of the provision as it came to us from the House. I was in favor, at the time when the increased rate of compensation was given, of that increased rate of compensation; and I was then opposed to the provision incorporated into the bill in virtue of which that increased rate of compensation was to be subject to discontinuance upon a subsequent notice by Congress. I have seen nothing since that time to change my opinions in relation to any part of the subject. I do not wish to keep this matter always recurring at every succeeding session of Congress, with applications made for giving the notice and putting an end to the contract, stirring up the question from time to time and from year to year, and keeping it always a matter uncertain in the public estimation whether this great enterprise is to be supported and carried through by the Government. My opinion is, that the House of Representatives have acted wisely. The additional compensation having been shown to be reasonable, the enterprise concerning at once the interest and the honor of the country, I think the House have acted wisely in proposing to take it out of future contest in Congress, and to save both the country and the persons who are engaged in the prosecution of this enterprise from this perpetually recurring agitation with regard to the termination of the contract. I am, therefore, for one, in favor of holding on to the provision of the bill as it comes to us from the House, and I hope the Senate will not concur in the amendment moved by the Committee on Finance.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, I agree entirely with the views stated by the honorable Senator from North Carolina; and I will mention, in addition to what he has said, that the effect of the amendment proposed by the committee could only reach the three last years of the contract. The contract has now about five years to run. If you reserve the power to give notice, what will be the result? You cannot act on any appropriation bill of this kind so as to give the notice, probably before July of next year, and no notice to be effective, would go into operation before the ensuing January. There would, then, be but three years of the contract remaining. It seems to me, therefore, that by retaining this power you cripple the efficiency of the line, because you leave things in an uncertain state. You will not diminish the cost to the Government, for, against the cost of the contract on the one side, you must take the expense of prolonged discussion, and the consequent consumption of time involved by bringing the question before Congress at each session. To avoid these difficulties, I think the provision of the bill as it comes from the House is proper, and I trust it will not be stricken out.

Mr. HUNTER called for the yeas and nays on the amendment; and they were ordered.

Mr. GEYER. Mr. President, those gentlemen who were here in 1852 will remember that I was then opposed to any change in the contract for the transportation of the mail by this line of steamers. I saw nothing in the representations which were then made, giving to these parties any claim for increased compensation, under the contract which they had entered into. The Senate, however, inserted in the deficiency bill of that year a clause allowing them a compensation at the rate of $33,000 a trip, instead of $19,250. Against that I voted. They also inserted a proviso, without which, let me say, the extra compensation never could have passed either House of Congress, reserving to Congress the right, at any time after the 31st day of December, 1854, to terminate the contract upon six months' notice. Regarding that as a new stipulation between the United States and those parties, I am disposed to adhere to it. I look upon that as a contract which we are to construe favorably towards the other party, but not in such wise as to surrender the only guaranty we have that the contract will be performed. I understood it to mean, when we put in that proviso, that, in the event of the contingency of a non-compliance on the part of these contractors with their high promises, in consideration of which the increased compensation was granted, we might terminate it; and not otherwise. Therefore, when, at the last session, a proposition was made to give the notice, I voted against it, because I did not think the event had happened which, under a fair construction of their new contract, authorized us to put an end to the additional compensation; and there I am disposed to rest it.

The original contract was for twenty trips per annum at $19,250 each. You have stipulations in that contract which require a performance; and in the event of a breach of the contract, you have your remedy; but I submit to honorable Senators, if we adopt the proviso of the House, what security shall we have that they will perform the twenty-six trips which were provided for in the act of 1852? Is not the power to give the notice the only security which we have to insure the performance of that contract on their part? Now we pay $16,000 a trip for the speed of these vessels; that is to say, we pay $16,000 a trip more than would be required to be paid to them if they made no greater speed than the Cunard steamers. I have before me a speech of an honorable member in the other House, giving the testimony of these parties themselves, by which it appears that we pay $9,000 discrimination in favor of this line, because it enters the port of New York. We pay $16,000 on account of the increased speed, for they themselves inform us that they could perform their trips with as great a speed as the Cunard line for $16,000 a trip less than it now costs them. Now, I repeat the inquiry—repeal the clause which authorizes us to give the notice, and where is your security? With the temptation of $16,000 multiplied twenty-six times in the course of the year, have we any security that we shall receive what we are paying for?

Mr. President, I have no doubt that the owners of this line have rendered essential service to the country; and I am disposed to continue the compensation which we agreed to allow them upon the terms contained in the act of 1852. I have no doubt they will make every effort to accomplish what that act requires should be accomplished, in order to entitle them to the compensation; but, sir, I am not contracting for myself; and I do not feel at liberty to vote away the difference between $385,000 and $858,000 a year, with no better security for the performance of the contract than will then be afforded.

It is true the House of Representatives propose to provide for the building of another ship; but that is to make a new contract; and, as I said on a former occasion, I now repeat, I do not believe in the policy of this attempt to build up, under the name of a military marine, a commercial marine for the benefit of the commerce between one city of this Union, and another across the Atlantic. I should be disposed to secure the transportation of the mails across the Atlantic by another, and a very different arrangement. When a contract has been entered into; when we have once changed that contract, and given increased compensation, and have given it upon terms and upon conditions without which it could never have passed the Senate and House of Representatives, I am unwilling to go further. Once more, I ask Senators what security have they, other than the honor of these contractors, if we repeal this clause in the act of 1852? It may be said that we must trust something to them. Have they no trust, let me ask also, in Congress, contracting on the part of the United States, that they will forbear to give notice unless occasion occurs, when there shall be a failure to perform the service contemplated by the act of 1852? Can they not (the proposition to give notice having been once made, and voted down by the Senate) rely with as much confidence on the fidelity of Congress to their contract, as we can rely on the fidelity of the contractors when we are about to present to them the temptation to diminish the speed of their vessels, by reducing the cost at the rate of $16,000 a trip.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I move to amend the amendment of the Committee on Finance by inserting in lieu of it:

That the Secretary of the Navy is hereby directed to give the notice provided in the first section of the act entitled "An act to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the fiscal year ending the 30th of June, 1852," approved the 21st day of July, 1852, to terminate the arrangement of the additional allowance for the transportation of the United States mail between New York and Liverpool in the Collins line of steamers as therein provided."

I offer this amendment at this time, Mr. President, in order that the issue may fairly be brought before the Senate. It has to come to this at last. The amendment offered by the Committee on Finance does not meet the issue, and hence I propose this amendment, which brings us directly to the main contest before us. It will be remembered that at an early day of the session I announced to the Senate that if no other Senator would offer this proposition I should feel myself constrained to do so. I endeavor to-day to perform that duty and redeem that pledge, and I may be permitted to express my regret that I am in a condition so poorly to perform a service which is so very important.

In offering the amendment, I am actuated by no spirit of unkindness to Mr. Collins or his company. On the contrary, I have abundant reason to cherish feelings of great personal kindness and respect, not only for Mr. Collins, but for many members of the association at the head of which he stands. I have received testimonials of personal kindness and respect from them. In addition to that disinclination which I feel to interfere on this occasion, I might superadd, that a personal relationship with some of the parties renders it exceedingly painful to me to be found differing from them, for among them I find some of my warmest and most sincere personal and political friends. I confess to you, sir, and to the Senate, that I have arrived at a determination to offer the amendment, and advocate its passage, not without some conflict with my own feelings. If I had yielded to the suggestions of my personal feelings, if I had looked to the especial interest which many of my personal friends have in the passage of the provision as it comes from the House, I should be content simply to give a silent vote; but I have not been able to satisfy myself that my personal feelings are to be regarded when they come in conflict with the discharge of public duty. Actuated, therefore, as I hope and believe, if I know myself, only by a desire to subserve the public service, and discharge a public duty, I have felt myself constrained to offer this amendment.

I have been met by arguments after arguments, many of them entitled to consideration, many of them persuasive, many of them addressed to the kindlier and more generous sensibilities of our nature. I have been reminded of the sad and melancholy catastrophe of the ill-fated Arctic. Sir, no man in America deplores that catastrophe more than I do. No man would more willingly repair it, if within the compass of human power, than I would. If this appropriation were intended to repair that accident, I should gladly vote it. If it were within the compass of human power, by the exercise of human agency, even to the pouring out of the last dollar in the national Treasury, to rescue from a watery grave the sleeping victims of that ill-fated vessel, I would vote the last dollar in the Treasury to accomplish it. Yes, sir, I would go further than that; and if we had power to bring to life a single victim of that fatal catastrophe, even if it should exhaust every dollar in the national Treasury to bring up from his sleeping on the coral beds of the deep blue sea the lamented son of an officer of this body, I would willingly agree to vote the last dollar for the purpose. [The allusion was to young Holland, son of the assistant Sergeant-at-Arms and Doorkeeper, who is memorable for the fidelity with which he stood to the signal gun until the Arctic went down.] Sir, amidst all the events of life which have come under my knowledge, I have seen no picture that strikes so fully at the heart as the picture of that unfortunate young man, and it will constitute a theme for the pen of the poet, and the pencil of the painter, when you and I shall have passed away.

But, Mr. President, what have all these sympathies to do with this question? It is not proposed to take this money which you are asked to appropriate, and divide it between the victims of that catastrophe; but it is to go into the coffers of a company under a contract made with the Government of the United States, and it is to that contract that I propose to address myself.

Two years and a half ago we had a long, able, and interesting debate upon this question. In reviewing that debate, which I have done with a great deal of care and industry, I find an address delivered by the distinguished Senator from New York, [Mr. SEWARD,] an address characterized by that ability which usually characterizes his speeches; for, sir, however much my prejudices and passions may incline me against the doctrines and opinions of that distinguished Senator, I hope never to be so lost to truth, and candor, and frankness, as to deny to him ability of the highest order. My only regret is, that such eminent ability should be so ill-directed, according, at least, to my humble judgment. In the address of that distinguished Senator, he propounded two questions to the American Senate. The opening of his remarks was: "What will Congress do?—what has Congress done?—for the Collins steamers."

The first interrogatory, pretending to no prescience, I shall not attempt to answer. If there is anything Omniscience itself does not know, it is what Congress will do. After what Congress has done, I shall not be astonished at any thing that Congress may do. The second interrogatory of the honorable Senator, I think I can answer, and, with the indulgence of the Senate, I shall endeavor briefly to answer it from the law and the testimony. What has Congress done for the Collins line of steamers?

On the 6th day of March, 1846, Mr. Collins and his friends submitted to the Congress of the United States a proposition to carry the mail from New York to Liverpool—Congress entertained that proposition. There is one thing that Congress has done for the Collins line of steamers. On the 1st day of November, 1847, under the direction of Congress, a contract was entered into with Mr. Collins and his associates, to carry a mail from New York to Liverpool, twenty times per annum. There is another thing that Congress has done for the Collins steamers. What was that contract entered into between the Government of the United States and Mr. Collins on the 1st of November, 1847? Mr. Collins contracted to build five vessels, of given dimensions and power. He agreed that four of them should be built within eighteen or twenty months from the signing of the contract, and the fifth vessel as soon thereafter as practicable. Further, it was provided that the Government of the United States should be allowed to place upon each vessel four midshipmen of the United States Navy. There were other powers conferred, mutually, on the part of Mr. Collins and the Government of the United States, which are immaterial.

Congress, then, did these things for the Collins steamers. What follows? Mr. Collins failed to perform his contract. He was to put the line in operation in eighteen months after the signing of the agreement, but he failed to accomplish that part of the contract. What followed? He came to the Congress of the United States, and asked Congress to amend the contract and extend the time. Congress amended the contract, and extended the time. That, too, Congress has done for the Collins steamers.

But, Mr. President, Mr. Collins, after binding himself to build the vessels in a specified time, failed to execute his contract, and came here to get it changed. What did he then ask? He said it was impossible to finish the vessels within the specified time, and he asked that the contract should be changed in that particular, and that there should be advanced from the Treasury $25,000 a month upon each of the vessels, from the time they were launched up to the time they were ready to sail, until the sum thus advanced should reach $385,000. Congress assented to this third amendment of the contract, and advanced to Mr. Collins $25,000 upon each of the vessels, until the amount reached $385,000, equal to one year's compensation. This is another thing which Congress has done for Collins & Co.

After that, Mr. Collins came back to Congress, and asked them to change the contract the fourth time. For what? I suppose Mr. Collins found it inconvenient, or not according to his conceptions of the dignity of the position which the officers of his vessels were expected to hold, to have midshipmen there under the auspices and direction of the Government. Although the contract required him to find accommodations for four midshipmen, he asked to be relieved from that provision, and again Congress yielded to the solicitations of Mr. Collins, and repealed the provision. There is another thing which Congress has done for the Collins steamers.

Mr. President, this is not all. After this line proceeded to discharge the duty of carrying the mail, again, in 1852, for the fifth time, we find Mr. Collins standing at the portals of the Capitol and asking for another revision of his contract. He had contracted to carry the mails for $19,250 a trip, but he said that he could not do it without a loss to himself and his friends, and he therefore asked for a change of the contract. That change was in raising the compensation from $19,250 a trip to $33,000 a trip. Now, I put the question to every Senator who will divest himself of his fancies or his prejudices, whether that was not one of the most extraordinary demands ever made upon an assembly of enlightened gentlemen. A man who is said to have more experience and wisdom in navigation than any one who lives, made a proposition to Congress, which was accepted; but when he attempted to perform it, he found he was mistaken, and that instead of $19,250 a trip, which he originally asked, he should have $33,000. Congress then changed the contract for the fifth time, and increased the compensation of Mr. Collins according to his request. His original contract was $385,000 per annum for twenty trips. Under the act of 1852, the trips were increased to twenty-six, and the pay was raised from $385,000 for twenty trips to $858,000 for twenty-six trips.

There is something very substantial which Congress has done for the Collins line of steamers. What is now asked? Not only that we shall continue that increased pay, but shall deny to Congress the power hereafter to annul that contract. Are we prepared to do this? That is the question which we have to decide. I have some facts and figures on this point that I propose to offer for the consideration of the Senate, and upon them I ask them to decide whether they will grant this last request of Mr. Collins and his friends. If they agree to it, after the presentation of these facts and figures, I, for one, shall not open my mouth; but for the rest of my life I shall feel that any company or association of this kind can accomplish whatever they may deem expedient for themselves.

In 1852 we increased the annual compensation of the Collins line $473,000—nearly $500,000 a year. Was there ever such an astounding result seen before? Here was an increase of pay upon one steam line of $13,750 a trip, or $473,000 a year. Notwithstanding this fact, it is said, and may be true, that this is a losing business, and I am pointed to the fact—which is alleged to exist; I am impugning the integrity of nobody—that they have never been able to declare a dollar in dividends, and this is urged as a reason why it is an unprofitable business. Why have they not declared dividends? Is it because they have not earned them? I intend to prove that they have earned them; and I think I shall do so before I have done with the figures. We are told, however, that no dividends have been declared, and that it therefore follows that the business is unprofitable, and that we must continue our large payment to them. I propose to examine how this is.

I understand that the whole cost of the four vessels which have been built was $2,944,142 76. I understand that of this sum there were only $1,200,000 as the amount of stock actually paid in. The balance, $1,744,142 76, was borrowed capital; and I have heard—though, of course, I do not vouch for its correctness—that the profits which have been made, have been applied to the extinguishment of this borrowed capital, and that is the reason why no dividends have been declared.

Another question which has given rise to a good deal of controversy, is on the profit and loss account of this line. You will remember, sir, that, in order to arrive at something like a fair and just conclusion, I submitted to the Senate some weeks ago, a resolution asking the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads to ascertain, as far as possible, what were the amounts of money received by this line of steamers from freights and passengers.

I hold in my hand a communication from the Post Office Department on that subject, and also a letter from Mr. Bell, an officer of the Government, to the Postmaster General, to which I desire to call attention. I shall not weary the Senate by reading the documents, but shall simply state the conclusions. According to the best information which the Post Office Department could obtain and furnish to the Senate, it appears that there is a total yearly profit from freights and passengers on the Collins line of $1,601,600. Here are all the facts on which that conclusion is predicated. I admit it cannot be relied on as entirely perfect, for Mr. Bell had not access to the books of the company, and had to avail himself of the best information he could. He went to the registry of the port of New York to ascertain how many passengers left that port by this line of steamers. He assumed that as many came in as went out, and he went further, and he obtained the best evidence he could, and the result of his conclusion is, that the profit from mails and passengers amounted to $1,601,600. I had an interview with Mr. Collins on the subject, for if I know myself I do not wish to do anybody injustice. My only object is to prevent injustice being done to the country. I told Mr. Collins that if he had any testimony which would rebut this statement, I should cheerfully bring it before the Senate. He has done so, and I shall redeem the pledge with great pleasure. He has given me an affidavit which I hold in my hand, sworn to by William L. Youle, the secretary of the company, and here is the result of his estimates:

Total receipts for passengers and freights	$4,460,857 38
Mail pay received from the United States	3,413,966 00
Total receipts	7,874,733 38
Total disbursements	7,207,991 91
Surplus in the way of profits	$667,481 47

Mr. SEWARD. When was that statement made?

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. On the 17th of February, 1855, a few weeks ago. Now, I wish to know what became of this $667,000 of profits? In this statement he asks to be accredited with what?

Loss of the ill-fated Arctic	$255,000
Depreciation of investment	258,000
Interest upon the whole capital at seven per cent. per annum	408,000
Total	$921,000

He then takes his profits and applies them to these losses on his vessels, and makes out a total loss of $253,924. This is a very fair calculation as between Mr. Collins and his friends, but what have we, as a party contracting with them for a specific service, to do with that? He shows that sion, therefore, to modify the amendment by leaving the appropriation as it stands, and simply to strike out the provision taking away the power to give notice.

There being no objection the amendment was so modified.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. FOOT.) The question is on the amendment of the Committee as modified, to strike out the words which have been read.

Therefore, when, at the last session, a proposition was made to give the notice, I voted against it, because I did not think the event had happened which, under a fair construction of their new contract, authorized us to put an end to the additional compensation; and there I am disposed to rest it.

The original contract was for twenty trips per annum at $19,250 each. You have stipulations in that contract which require a performance; and in the event of a breach of the contract, you have your remedy; but I submit to honorable Senators, if we adopt the proviso of the House, what security shall we have that they will perform the twenty-six trips which were provided for in the act of 1852? Is not the power to give the notice the only security which we have to insure the performance of that contract on their part? Now we pay $16,000 a trip for the speed of these vessels; that is to say, we pay $16,000 a trip more than would be required to be paid to them if they made no greater speed than the Cunard steamers. I have before me a speech of an honorable member in the other House, giving the testimony of these parties themselves, by which it appears that we pay $9,000 discrimination in favor of this line, because it enters the port of New York. We pay $16,000 on account of the increased speed, for they themselves inform us that they could perform their trips with as great a speed as the Cunard line for $16,000 a trip less than it now costs them. Now, I repeat the inquiry—repeal the clause which authorizes us to give the notice, and where is your security? With the temptation of $16,000 multiplied twenty-six times in the course of the year, have we any security that we shall receive what we are paying for?

Mr. President, I have no doubt that the owners of this line have rendered essential service to the country; and I am disposed to continue the compensation which we agreed to allow them upon the terms contained in the act of 1852. I have no doubt they will make every effort to accomplish what that act requires should be accomplished, in order to entitle them to the compensation; but, sir, I am not contracting for myself; and I do not feel at liberty to vote away the difference between $385,000 and $858,000 a year, with no better security for the performance of the contract than will then be afforded.

It is true the House of Representatives propose to provide for the building of another ship; but that is to make a new contract; and, as I said on a former occasion, I now repeat, I do not believe in the policy of this attempt to build up, under the name of a military marine, a commercial marine for the benefit of the commerce between one city of this Union, and another across the Atlantic. I should be disposed to secure the transportation of the mails across the Atlantic by another, and a very different arrangement. When a contract has been entered into; when we have once changed that contract, and given increased compensation, and have given it upon terms and upon conditions without which it could never have passed the Senate and House of Representatives, I am unwilling to go further. Once more, I ask Senators what security have they, other than the honor of these contractors, if we repeal this clause in the act of 1852? It may be said that we must trust something to them. Have they no trust, let me ask also, in Congress, contracting on the part of the United States, that they will forbear to give notice unless occasion occurs, when there shall be a failure to perform the service contemplated by the act of 1852? Can they not (the proposition to give notice having been once made, and voted down by the Senate) rely with as much confidence on the fidelity of Congress to their contract, as we can rely on the fidelity of the contractors when we are about to present to them the temptation to diminish the speed of their vessels, by reducing the cost at the rate of $16,000 a trip.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I move to amend the amendment of the Committee on Finance by inserting in lieu of it:

That the Secretary of the Navy is hereby directed to give the notice provided in the first section of the act entitled "An act to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the fiscal year ending the 30th of June, 1852," approved the 21st day of July, 1852, to terminate the arrangement of the additional allowance for the transportation of the United States mail between New York and Liverpool in the Collins line of steamers as therein provided."

I offer this amendment at this time, Mr. President, in order that the issue may fairly be brought before the Senate. It has to come to this at last. The amendment offered by the Committee on Finance does not meet the issue, and hence I propose this amendment, which brings us directly to the main contest before us. It will be remembered that at an early day of the session I announced to the Senate that if no other Senator would offer this proposition I should feel myself constrained to do so. I endeavor to-day to perform that duty and redeem that pledge, and I may be permitted to express my regret that I am in a condition so poorly to perform a service which is so very important.

In offering the amendment, I am actuated by no spirit of unkindness to Mr. Collins or his company. On the contrary, I have abundant reason to cherish feelings of great personal kindness and respect, not only for Mr. Collins, but for many members of the association at the head of which he stands. I have received testimonials of personal kindness and respect from them. In addition to that disinclination which I feel to interfere on this occasion, I might superadd, that a personal relationship with some of the parties renders it exceedingly painful to me to be found differing from them, for among them I find some of my warmest and most sincere personal and political friends. I confess to you, sir, and to the Senate, that I have arrived at a determination to offer the amendment, and advocate its passage, not without some conflict with my own feelings. If I had yielded to the suggestions of my personal feelings, if I had looked to the especial interest which many of my personal friends have in the passage of the provision as it comes from the House, I should be content simply to give a silent vote; but I have not been able to satisfy myself that my personal feelings are to be regarded when they come in conflict with the discharge of public duty. Actuated, therefore, as I hope and believe, if I know myself, only by a desire to subserve the public service, and discharge a public duty, I have felt myself constrained to offer this amendment.

I have been met by arguments after arguments, many of them entitled to consideration, many of them persuasive, many of them addressed to the kindlier and more generous sensibilities of our nature. I have been reminded of the sad and melancholy catastrophe of the ill-fated Arctic. Sir, no man in America deplores that catastrophe more than I do. No man would more willingly repair it, if within the compass of human power, than I would. If this appropriation were intended to repair that accident, I should gladly vote it. If it were within the compass of human power, by the exercise of human agency, even to the pouring out of the last dollar in the national Treasury, to rescue from a watery grave the sleeping victims of that ill-fated vessel, I would vote the last dollar in the Treasury to accomplish it. Yes, sir, I would go further than that; and if we had power to bring to life a single victim of that fatal catastrophe, even if it should exhaust every dollar in the national Treasury to bring up from his sleeping on the coral beds of the deep blue sea the lamented son of an officer of this body, I would willingly agree to vote the last dollar for the purpose. [The allusion was to young Holland, son of the assistant Sergeant-at-Arms and Doorkeeper, who is memorable for the fidelity with which he stood to the signal gun until the Arctic went down.] Sir, amidst all the events of life which have come under my knowledge, I have seen no picture that strikes so fully at the heart as the picture of that unfortunate young man, and it will constitute a theme for the pen of the poet, and the pencil of the painter, when you and I shall have passed away.

But, Mr. President, what have all these sympathies to do with this question? It is not proposed to take this money which you are asked to appropriate, and divide it between the victims of that catastrophe; but it is to go into the coffers of a company under a contract made with the Government of the United States, and it is to that contract that I propose to address myself.

Two years and a half ago we had a long, able, and interesting debate upon this question. In reviewing that debate, which I have done with a great deal of care and industry, I find an address delivered by the distinguished Senator from New York, [Mr. SEWARD,] an address characterized by that ability which usually characterizes his speeches; for, sir, however much my prejudices and passions may incline me against the doctrines and opinions of that distinguished Senator, I hope never to be so lost to truth, and candor, and frankness, as to deny to him ability of the highest order. My only regret is, that such eminent ability should be so ill-directed, according, at least, to my humble judgment. In the address of that distinguished Senator, he propounded two questions to the American Senate. The opening of his remarks was: "What will Congress do?—what has Congress done?—for the Collins steamers."

The first interrogatory, pretending to no prescience, I shall not attempt to answer. If there is anything Omniscience itself does not know, it is what Congress will do. After what Congress has done, I shall not be astonished at any thing that Congress may do. The second interrogatory of the honorable Senator, I think I can answer, and, with the indulgence of the Senate, I shall endeavor briefly to answer it from the law and the testimony. What has Congress done for the Collins line of steamers?

On the 6th day of March, 1846, Mr. Collins and his friends submitted to the Congress of the United States a proposition to carry the mail from New York to Liverpool—Congress entertained that proposition. There is one thing that Congress has done for the Collins line of steamers. On the 1st day of November, 1847, under the direction of Congress, a contract was entered into with Mr. Collins and his associates, to carry a mail from New York to Liverpool, twenty times per annum. There is another thing that Congress has done for the Collins steamers. What was that contract entered into between the Government of the United States and Mr. Collins on the 1st of November, 1847? Mr. Collins contracted to build five vessels, of given dimensions and power. He agreed that four of them should be built within eighteen or twenty months from the signing of the contract, and the fifth vessel as soon thereafter as practicable. Further, it was provided that the Government of the United States should be allowed to place upon each vessel four midshipmen of the United States Navy. There were other powers conferred, mutually, on the part of Mr. Collins and the Government of the United States, which are immaterial.

Congress, then, did these things for the Collins steamers. What follows? Mr. Collins failed to perform his contract. He was to put the line in operation in eighteen months after the signing of the agreement, but he failed to accomplish that part of the contract. What followed? He came to the Congress of the United States, and asked Congress to amend the contract and extend the time. Congress amended the contract, and extended the time. That, too, Congress has done for the Collins steamers.

But, Mr. President, Mr. Collins, after binding himself to build the vessels in a specified time, failed to execute his contract, and came here to get it changed. What did he then ask? He said it was impossible to finish the vessels within the specified time, and he asked that the contract should be changed in that particular, and that there should be advanced from the Treasury $25,000 a month upon each of the vessels, from the time they were launched up to the time they were ready to sail, until the sum thus advanced should reach $385,000. Congress assented to this third amendment of the contract, and advanced to Mr. Collins $25,000 upon each of the vessels, until the amount reached $385,000, equal to one year's compensation. This is another thing which Congress has done for Collins & Co.

After that, Mr. Collins came back to Congress, and asked them to change the contract the fourth time. For what? I suppose Mr. Collins found it inconvenient, or not according to his conceptions of the dignity of the position which the officers of his vessels were expected to hold, to have midshipmen there under the auspices and direction of the Government. Although the contract required him to find accommodations for four midshipmen, he asked to be relieved from that provision, and again Congress yielded to the solicitations of Mr. Collins, and repealed the provision. There is another thing which Congress has done for the Collins steamers.

Mr. President, this is not all. After this line proceeded to discharge the duty of carrying the mail, again, in 1852, for the fifth time, we find Mr. Collins standing at the portals of the Capitol and asking for another revision of his contract. He had contracted to carry the mails for $19,250 a trip, but he said that he could not do it without a loss to himself and his friends, and he therefore asked for a change of the contract. That change was in raising the compensation from $19,250 a trip to $33,000 a trip. Now, I put the question to every Senator who will divest himself of his fancies or his prejudices, whether that was not one of the most extraordinary demands ever made upon an assembly of enlightened gentlemen. A man who is said to have more experience and wisdom in navigation than any one who lives, made a proposition to Congress, which was accepted; but when he attempted to perform it, he found he was mistaken, and that instead of $19,250 a trip, which he originally asked, he should have $33,000. Congress then changed the contract for the fifth time, and increased the compensation of Mr. Collins according to his request. His original contract was $385,000 per annum for twenty trips. Under the act of 1852, the trips were increased to twenty-six, and the pay was raised from $385,000 for twenty trips to $858,000 for twenty-six trips.

There is something very substantial which Congress has done for the Collins line of steamers. What is now asked? Not only that we shall continue that increased pay, but shall deny to Congress the power hereafter to annul that contract. Are we prepared to do this? That is the question which we have to decide. I have some facts and figures on this point that I propose to offer for the consideration of the Senate, and upon them I ask them to decide whether they will grant this last request of Mr. Collins and his friends. If they agree to it, after the presentation of these facts and figures, I, for one, shall not open my mouth; but for the rest of my life I shall feel that any company or association of this kind can accomplish whatever they may deem expedient for themselves.

In 1852 we increased the annual compensation of the Collins line $473,000—nearly $500,000 a year. Was there ever such an astounding result seen before? Here was an increase of pay upon one steam line of $13,750 a trip, or $473,000 a year. Notwithstanding this fact, it is said, and may be true, that this is a losing business, and I am pointed to the fact—which is alleged to exist; I am impugning the integrity of nobody—that they have never been able to declare a dollar in dividends, and this is urged as a reason why it is an unprofitable business. Why have they not declared dividends? Is it because they have not earned them? I intend to prove that they have earned them; and I think I shall do so before I have done with the figures. We are told, however, that no dividends have been declared, and that it therefore follows that the business is unprofitable, and that we must continue our large payment to them. I propose to examine how this is.

I understand that the whole cost of the four vessels which have been built was $2,944,142 76. I understand that of this sum there were only $1,200,000 as the amount of stock actually paid in. The balance, $1,744,142 76, was borrowed capital; and I have heard—though, of course, I do not vouch for its correctness—that the profits which have been made, have been applied to the extinguishment of this borrowed capital, and that is the reason why no dividends have been declared.

Another question which has given rise to a good deal of controversy, is on the profit and loss account of this line. You will remember, sir, that, in order to arrive at something like a fair and just conclusion, I submitted to the Senate some weeks ago, a resolution asking the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads to ascertain, as far as possible, what were the amounts of money received by this line of steamers from freights and passengers.

I hold in my hand a communication from the Post Office Department on that subject, and also a letter from Mr. Bell, an officer of the Government, to the Postmaster General, to which I desire to call attention. I shall not weary the Senate by reading the documents, but shall simply state the conclusions. According to the best information which the Post Office Department could obtain and furnish to the Senate, it appears that there is a total yearly profit from freights and passengers on the Collins line of $1,601,600. Here are all the facts on which that conclusion is predicated. I admit it cannot be relied on as entirely perfect, for Mr. Bell had not access to the books of the company, and had to avail himself of the best information he could. He went to the registry of the port of New York to ascertain how many passengers left that port by this line of steamers. He assumed that as many came in as went out, and he went further, and he obtained the best evidence he could, and the result of his conclusion is, that the profit from mails and passengers amounted to $1,601,600. I had an interview with Mr. Collins on the subject, for if I know myself I do not wish to do anybody injustice. My only object is to prevent injustice being done to the country. I told Mr. Collins that if he had any testimony which would rebut this statement, I should cheerfully bring it before the Senate. He has done so, and I shall redeem the pledge with great pleasure. He has given me an affidavit which I hold in my hand, sworn to by William L. Youle, the secretary of the company, and here is the result of his estimates:

Total receipts for passengers and freights	$4,460,857 38
Mail pay received from the United States	3,413,966 00
Total receipts	7,874,733 38
Total disbursements	7,207,891 91
Surplus in the way of profits	$667,481 47

Mr. SEWARD. When was that statement made?

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. On the 17th of February, 1855, a few weeks ago. Now, I wish to know what became of this $667,000 of profits? In this statement he asks to be accredited with what?

Loss of the ill-fated Arctic	$255,000
Depreciation of investment	258,000
Interest upon the whole capital at seven per cent. per annum	408,000
Total	$921,000

He then takes his profits and applies them to these losses on his vessels, and makes out a total loss of $253,924. This is a very fair calculation as between Mr. Collins and his friends, but what have we, as a party contracting with them for a specific service, to do with that? He shows that he has received for frieghts and passengers, and for the Government mails, $667,000 more than he has paid out in running his vessels; but when you deduct from that sum the interest and depreciation account and the loss of the Arctic, he brings us in debt, according to his statement, $253,924.

Mr. COOPER. I wish to ask the honorable Senator a question for information. Does a portion of the $7,000,000 of expenses embrace money paid to relieve the original loan made for the purchase?

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I have given the statement precisely as it has been presented by his own officer.

Mr. COOPER. I apprehend that is included.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. In the statement sworn to by his own officer he gives the receipts of each vessel of the line, and then puts down the disbursements for each voyage and each vessel, and winds up by a recapitulation which I have already stated. Then, by his own showing, he has already got back all that he has paid out, and interest on his capital, and loss upon his vessels, and depreciation upon his vessels, except $253,000. Now I have redeemed my pledge to Mr. Collins. I have given his own statement. I shall not assail it. I shall not attack the veracity of the officer who has sworn to it. I dare say it is perfectly true; but whether true or false, it has nothing to do with the contract between the Government of the United States and Mr. Collins, and it is to that contract that I propose to address myself.

Now let me ask what has been paid by the Government to Mr. Collins? According to his own showing the Government of the United States paid him, up to the 17th February, 1855, $3,413,916 57. Thus in five years, the Government alone has paid $469,733 81 more than the whole amount of the cost of the vessels, or what may be assumed to be the capital invested by Mr. Collins and his associates in the enterprise. When did mortal man ever hear of a better contract? Mr. Collins received from Congress a contract, and in the first five years of this contract the Government alone, by way of stipend, paid him all his capital which he invested, and $469,733 over and above that capital. Where is the man who would not stipulate for a contract of that sort? Where is the man who would not be willing to embark in an enterprise where such success was guarantied to him. Who would not take a contract, the result of which, in five years, would be to reimburse him all his capital and give him a surplus of $669 000 in addition to his capital, with all the chances of profit from the trade and transportation of persons and property? This amount of profit, it seems to me, ought to be sufficient to satisfy anybody, but these gentlemen are not satisfied with what they have received, and they are again knocking at the portals of the capital, and asking for a continuation of the contract on these terms for five years. Suppose you do continue it for five years, what will be the result? How much will you be required to pay for the next five years in addition to what you have already paid? You have already paid $3,413,916 57; and if you comply with this last demand you will pay, before the termination of the contract, $4 385,000 more. If the contract be continued to 1860, at the present rates, what will you have to pay to Mr. Collins by the end of that time? I hope not to astonish gentlemen, or drive them from their propriety by the statement of the amount, but I confess that until I looked into the figures I should have been profoundly astonished at the result. At the end of the contract, if it be continued as we are now asked to do, this Government will have paid Mr. Collins and his associates $7,785,565 70.

In the name of reason and common sense and common honesty, where does the history of legislation show such benefits as these, conferred on one individual or company? In ten years you will have paid $7,785,000—almost three times the amount of the original investment, and during the whole time Mr. Collins enjoying the benefits arising from the transportation of persons and property on his line. We have heard talk about the enormity of the tariff of 1828, but here is a tariff beyond all precedent. Here is protection with a vengeance—protection amounting to absolute prohibition of competition. Who can compete with Mr. Collins in running steamships across the ocean, with the Government paying him in ten years nearly $8,000,000? Where is the man rash enough, insane enough to attempt to navigate the ocean by the side of Mr. Collins, when the Government stands at his back with $8,000,000, and the other American citizen has to rely on his own energies? I am in favor of protection, but this is rather too strong for me. I cannot approve of it.

I have not yet done with the figures. I have already stated that the original vessels built by Mr. Collins cost $2,944,000. He has now three vessels on hand, and those vessels cost, originally, $2,208,107. That is the amount of capital now invested. The company received the insurance upon the Arctic, and I apprehend that the loss could not have been very great, for the insurance was for $600,000; but I have nothing to do with that. I have said that the Collins line have now three steamers which cost $2,208,107. According to the statement furnished in 1852 by Mr. Collins, the annual depreciation of the vessels is seven per cent. I have inquired of other persons familiar with steamships, and they say from seven to ten per cent. Desiring, however, to be as fair as possible, I put the depreciation down at only five per cent., and then you will find that it amounts to $552,026. Take that from the aggregate original cost, and the vessels now owned by Collins & Co. are worth $1,655,981. That, then, is the capital now invested. Upon this head I have a proposition to make to the Senate, which I will state. I suppose nobody doubts that we have a right to end the contract by giving six months' notice. Then why may we not do it! We are asked, Will you do it, and leave Mr. Collins with his vessels on hand? For myself, rather than pay Mr. Collins $4,385,000 for the next five years, in order to sustain a capital of $1.655,981, I would buy his three vessels and pay him the full cash value for them, $1.655,981. Suppose you were to buy the vessels, and take them out into New York bay and set them on fire; you would have sunk $1,655,981, but in the end it would be a saving to the Government. If you deduct the amount the vessels would cost from the amount which he asks you to pay him for the next five years, that is, $4,385,000, you will have remaining $2,729,019 of saving. After buying the vessels and putting them in your Navy, or burning them, if you please, you will have saved $2,729,019 to the Treasury. Suppose we should do that, and then let out a contract to carry the mail for twenty-six trips on the terms proposed by Mr. Vanderbilt, amounting to $15,000 a trip, or $390,000 a year, or $1,959,000 in five years. Then, after you have burnt your Collins vessels, and paid Vanderbilt all that he asks for carrying the mail as often as Collins carries it, you will have saved $779,019.

If any Senator can controvert these figures let him rise and do so now. I assert their truth, and they are so striking that I beg leave to repeat them briefly. The amount which you are asked to pay for the next five years to Mr. Collins is $4,385,000. The value of his vessels now on hand is $1,655,981. Mr. Vanderbilt asks $1,950,000 to carry the mail for the same length of time, and in the same number of trips. Pay for the vessels and deduct their value from the amount which you are asked to allow to Collins, and you have left $2,729,019.

Then pay Mr. Vanderbilt all that he asks for carrying the mail for the same length of time and you will have in your Treasury, at the end of the contract, $779,019 more than you will have under the Collins contract, and in addition to that you will have the vessels.

Mr. BAYARD. Will the honorable gentleman allow me to interrupt him at this point?

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. Certainly, sir.

Mr. BAYARD. Of course these statements and calculations of the honorable Senator from Tennessee come on me unprepared; but I think a very obvious answer may be made to the point upon which he is now treating to show that the statements which he makes are not altogether satisfactory. He assumes that the cost for carrying the mails will be a certain sum according to the proposition of Captain Vanderbilt.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I believe I have stated correctly, but if not, I, of course, wish to be set right.

Mr. BAYARD. The Senator, taking the entire cost according to what he says is Vanderbilt's proposition for the same period of time that the Collins contract has yet to run, says the Government would save $779,000 in the difference of price between the two. Is that the statement?

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. Yes, sir.

Mr. BAYARD. Now, sir, that will depend upon one fact which the honorable Senator throws entirely out of his calculations. Mr. Vanderbilt offers to run a line for so much, but he makes no stipulations in that offer as to the speed of the vessels which he is to run. If he establishes a line which will run in sixteen or eighteen days, the entire amount of postage which you now receive will pass into the hands of the faster line of the British Government. This is an item which must be taken into the calculation of your loss in order to get at the result. I have not the materials before me to make an exact calculation; but I am perfectly satisfied that the loss of the amount of the postage which you now receive by the aid of the Collins line would be far more than equivalent to the sum which the gentleman assumes to be the gain.

Now there can be no doubt that Mr. Vanderbilt, who understands thoroughly the business in which he is engaged, takes great care in his proposition which has been printed and laid on our tables to make no stipulations either as to the character of his vessels, or the speed at which they are to run; and yet the question of speed or velocity is an element of cost, which goes to an extent which is hard to be estimated without calculation. I do not mean to enter into it; it is too late in the session to go into all the details connected with the matter, even if I were sufficiently conversant with them to do so. I have no interest in this question, except the national feeling which I have for the success of this line as a great improvement, and probably a feeling of pride in regard to its superiority over the rival line of Great Britain.

I have had several conversations with the chief engineer of your Navy on this subject, and I ascertain that there is a rule by which they estimate the expense of running a vessel in proportion to speed applied to the same tonnage. I think he stated to me that the rule was, that, for the increased speed, the power necessary, and the consumption of fuel incident to it, would be as the cube of the increased distance. That is the statement of Mr. Martin, the chief engineer of your Navy. He showed me the rule in an English treatise, which gave the average calculations for all distances at so many knots per hour; and he stated to me that his own experience in steam vessels had verified the rule by practice. Take the case of one of the Collins steamers, running at a speed of thirteen knots an hour between New York and Liverpool, with smooth seas and no gales, and she can make the distance in nine days and nineteen hours. In order to make that speed, the steamer consumes nine hundred tons of coal. If, however, you permit the same steamer to run at an average speed of nine knots an hour, which would take her to Liverpool in fourteen days and fourteen hours, the consumption of coal would be four hundred and sixty tons. I am speaking entirely from memory, but I think I am very nearly, if not entirely, accurate. Any one can easily see the difference in expense which this difference in speed would make. In the one case—in the fast trip—the vessel would consume nine hundred tons of coal on the trip from New York to Liverpool, and would displace freight to the amount of the difference between four hundred and sixty tons and nine hundred tons. If any gentleman will take the trouble to make the calculation, he will see that the difference necessarily incurred by steamers complying with a contract of great speed (the speed at which these vessels run in order to make their quick passage) is something equivalent to the difference in cost. Their speed is equivalent to thirteen knots an hour, taking the average of head seas and gales which they have to encounter.

The result is, that the proposition which the Senator says is made to the Government by Captain Vanderbilt to carry the mails between New York and Liverpool, might be well made under those circumstances, in which the time was not specified, and could be easily accomplished without any great loss to the parties; but the loss would fall upon the Government in the diminution of its postages, because, beyond all question, the mass of the letters will always go in the fastest line. For these reasons, I do not think that this proposition is any evidence of loss that will result to the Government arising under the calculation of the honorable Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. It always gives me pleasure to have any honorable Senator interrupt me for the purpose of correction, but I do not like to have a speech of the length of that which has just been delivered by the honorable Senator from Delaware interlarded upon mine, it may be to break its strength. But, sir, I have a few words to say on the point raised by the honorable Senator from Delaware. I stated that Mr. Vanderbilt proposed to carry this mail for a certain sum. I have his printed proposition in my hand. That proposition is, that he will carry a mail twice a month, or twenty-six trips per annum, from New York to Liverpool and back. The honorable Senator asks what guarantee have we that Mr. Vanderbilt intends to carry it in the same time that Collins carries it. Now let me inform the honorable Senator that there is not a solitary word in the contract of Mr. Collins compelling him to do anything more than is contained in Mr. Vanderbilt's proposition.

Mr. BAYARD. I made no such intimation. I was comparing what might be done. The fact that Mr. Collins has done it is evidence of good faith. The fact that he has expended his money to do what his contract did not call on him to do, is an argument in his favor.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I will take that statement; I will take the history of Mr. Collins as conclusive evidence that if we continue the contract on the terms proposed by the House of Representatives—which deny to Congress all power hereafter over the subject—that his integrity may be relied upon, that he will continue to carry the mail in the time he has done it—and assuming all that, I ask upon what hypothesis will you deny to Mr. Vanderbilt the same presumption? The contract of Mr. Collins simply provides for carrying a mail twice a month. Mr. Vanderbilt comes and makes the same proposition. Both propositions are identically the same upon the points of time and speed.

But, Mr. President, I do not mean to cavil about that matter. There are some other facts which I think of more importance. I neither know nor care anything about Mr. Vanderbilt. I know him when I see him. I know him by reputation as a man connected with the ship-building interests of the country. I know that he is indorsed by the members of Congress from New York as one of the ablest navigators the world has ever seen, and we all know that he has the ability, and we know that he has the means to do what he proposes. How, then, can we arrive at the conclusion that all the pride, all the patriotism, all the nationality connected with the steam navigation of the country, reside in Mr. Collins? I would do him no wrong; I am ready to render to him all honor for what he has done; but I cannot believe that if, in the dispensations of Heaven, he should be called from this earth, all the skill, all the national pride of our steam navigators would be buried with him. I accord to him all that can be claimed for him, but I ask for others as much as you accord to Mr. Collins. So far as the history of the two men goes, Mr. Vanderbilt will compare favorably with Mr. Collins, or any other man living. As there is no difference between the propositions of the two men, the argument of the Senator from Delaware on that point amounts to nothing.

But in the next place, suppose that Mr. Vanderbilt should not carry the mail within ten or twelve, or fifteen hours of the time in which Mr. Collins carries it, are you willing, for that difference of time, to pay to Mr. Collins $468,000 per annum for five years? I undertake to say that the proposition of Mr. Vanderbilt is the same with that of Mr. Collins, and contains everything that Collins's contains, and I undertake to say more, that for the $15,000 per trip for which Mr. Vanderbilt roposes to carry this mail, he will, if you require it, bind himself to run up to the time of the Cunarders. You may say that is not the Collins time. I grant it, and why is it that I limit it to the Cunarder's time? Because two years ago the argument used for the increased pay was, that it was necessary to enable the Collins line to compete with the Cunarders. Now, I take the responsibility of saying that, if you will give Mr. Vanderbilt the contract to carry the mail for $15,000 a trip for five years, he will run up to the time of the Cunarders, or he will forfeit $1,000,000. I say further that, if you are anxious to come up to the Collins time, Mr. Vanderbilt will bind himself in a bond of $2,000,000 to run up to the Collins time for $19,250 a trip.

There is the proposition fairly presented to us, and it cannot be got around. It must be met. Here is the Government proposing a public service. If it were to be performed in any part of the interior of the Union, advertisement would be made, and all American freemen would be permitted to come in and compete on equal terms. You and I are permitted to compete for all contracts now, and the Government makes the best bargain it can. Here is a contract to be made, and the question is, how will you make it? for I contend, that this occupies precisely the same position as if we were now making a new contract. How are we making it? The advocates of Mr. Collins tell us to make it with him. Well, sir, I am willing to make the contract with Mr. Collins, provided he will do what is fair, according to my judgment. He tells us that he will carry this mail for $33,000 a trip in a specified time, according to the argument of the honorable Senator from Delaware. Mr. Vanderbilt tells us that he will agree to carry it in the same time as Mr. Collins, for $19,250 a trip. To which of the two will you give it? You are letting out a contract for the country. The money to pay for it is to come out of the public Treasury. When such a contract is made in my State, and in every State, you let it out to the lowest and best bidder. Here are two men competing for the same mail service, one proposing to do it for $33,000 a trip, and the other willing to do it in the same time for $19,250 a trip, and you say you will give it to the man who proposes to do it for $33,000 a trip!

But, sir, I wish to present the question now in a somewhat different attitude. Mr. Vanderbilt proposes just as Mr. Collins did, to carry the mail twice a month, twenty-six trips a year, for $390,000, and yet you are paying Mr. Collins $858,000 for the same service, making a difference of $468,000 per annum. Why should you give one man $33,000 a trip for a certain service, and deny it to another who is willing to do it for $15,000? Why will you pay one man $858,000 a year, and refuse to give the same service to another man for $390,000? The two propositions make a difference of $467,000 to the Treasury.

Now, Mr. President, I wish to call the attention of the Senate to the further history of this subject, for the question constantly recurs on my mind what has Congress done, and I am trying to answer that. As I have already stated, in 1852 Congress increased the compensation for this service. What was the argument used at the time for that course? We were told then that the Collins line had been unfortunate, that the Atlantic had broken her shaft, and had got aground, and that it cost $100,000 to repair the accident. We were told also that the running of the line was an experiment, and that for the first two years until they got the "hang" of things, according to a common saying, or until they got their machinery all right, they were necessarily forced to incur extraordinary expenses, and had lost a large amount of money. Yielding to that argument, the Congress of the United States agreed to increase the pay as provided for in the act of 1852. My friend from North Carolina, [Mr. BADGER,] whom it always gives me much pleasure to follow, spoke a great deal on that subject, and, as he always does, spoke much good sense. I understand him to-day to protest against striking out that provision of the bill of the House of Representatives which declares that the contract shall be perpetual up to the year 1860, or in other words that Congress shall withdraw the power to give notice. I propose to read from some of the remarks of that Senator on that occasion. I expect that I shall get into difficulty by doing so, but I intend to bring forward the record, and to stand by that. In the debate in 1852 let us see what was said by the honorable Senator from North Carolina:

"Mr. BADGER. I intimated a short time ago that I had an amendment which I would propose, if the Senate should adopt this provision for the increase of compensation. I have been requested, by some of my friends, to read it, in order that the Senate may understand what it is. It is this:

"Provided, That the contracts for the transportation of said mails be, and are hereby, transferred from the Navy to the Post Office Department; and the Postmaster General is hereby directed to contract with said steamship company to carry said mail in their present steamers, at the rates aforesaid, payable out of the Treasury, for the unexpired term of the original contract, reserving, nevertheless, to Congress the right to direct the Postmaster General to put an end to the contract at any time after the 1st day of December, 1854, upon giving six months' notice to said company."

There is where we get the power over this contract. We are indebted to the distinguished, and learned, and honorable Senator from North Carolina, for the provision that Congress should retain power to end the contract after the 31st of December, 1854, upon giving six months' notice. That is just what the committee propose now to retain.

Mr. BADGER. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him for a moment?

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. With a great deal of pleasure.

Mr. BADGER. The amendment which I proposed has no resemblance at all to the power which was reserved under the act which was actually passed in 1852. The amendment which I offered to the bill was, in the first place, for transferring the contract to the Post Office Department, and then to authorize the Postmaster General, upon the direction of Congress at any time after December, 1854, to make an end of the contract, the effect of which would have been that the Government would have taken from the Collins line of steamers the vessels, according to the terms of the original agreement, at a valuation, and paid for them. That amendment was not adopted; but the provision incorporated into the bill was to make an increase of the compensation to $33,000 a trip, reserving to Congress not the power of making an end of the whole contract, and taking the ships at a valuation, but reserving to Congress the power of putting an end to the increased compensation, and leave the company under the obligations of the contract to continue the mail service at the original sum of $19,250 a trip. The proposition which I moved, and that which was agreed to, are totally different and unlike each other.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I know they are different, and unlike in some respects, but certainly not unlike in the main feature, and what is that? A reservation to Congress of the power to end the contract after December, 1854. That is the point.

Mr. BADGER. That is not the point actually reserved in the act which was passed. The power really reserved was to end the additional compensation, leaving the contract in full force at the original rate of compensation. The two propositions are totally different and distinct.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. Take it on that ground, and the honorable Senator simply occupies this position: that, while he was then in favor of ending the whole contract in 1852, according to the provisions of the amendment which he then suggested to the Senate, while he was then in favor of concluding the whole matter, he is now opposed to Congress having the power of concluding the extra pay allowed under the act of 1852.

Mr. BADGER. Keeping on the contract at the old rate? Certainly.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I do not see that there is any difference in principle, but I know very well that the honorable Senator can see it. I have never yet seen the honorable Senator in such a position that he was not able to make it perfectly indisputable to himself, and often to me, that he was right.

Mr. BADGER. I will make every Senator see the difference, the Senator from Tennessee himself included, when he gets through.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. No doubt the Senator thinks he can do it. I appeal to every Senator who was on this floor in 1852, if we were not then importuned to grant this additional compensation with the power to conclude it at the end of 1854, upon the ground which I have alleged, that it was an experiment, that the Collins line had lost money by it, and that in two years they could redeem themselves, and that, after that, they would be willing to submit to the decision of Congress as to whether they should fall back upon the original contract or not? I think I shall prove that from the record before I have done. By reference to th record, I find that my honorable colleague, [Mr BELL,] who was then, as now, a member of this body, offered the following amendment:

"Provided, That after the 30th of June, 1854, the rate of compensation to said line of steamships shall not exceed $19,250 per trip, unless Congress, in the mean time, shall otherwise direct."

How stood the vote of the Senate upon this proposition, not to reserve power, but to conclude the contract and to make fair compensation? The vote was yeas 20, nays 22. After that my distinguished friend from Georgia, [Mr. DAWSON,] who has been an original Collins line man, and voted for the additional compensation, offered an amendment, which I shall read. If I were disposed to do so, I could appeal to him to verify the statement which I make, that these gentlemen were then asking for additional compensation for the two years, and no longer. He offered an amendment to strike out of the proposition the power of giving notice, and to insert in the place of it:

"Provided, That after the 31st day of December, 1854, the rate of compensation to said line of steamers shall not exceed $19,250 per trip, unless Congress, in the mean time, shall otherwise provide."

On this proviso the vote was, yeas 18, nays 23. This shows that some, at least, of the friends of the measure at that time were willing to make the conclusion of the contract positive and absolute at the end of two years. Now, we have arrived at the end of those two years, and we are told that we should not stop the contract, but should withdraw the power to annul it, and continue to pay $858,000 a year for five years to come. That we have a right to conclude the contract nobody doubts. Why shall we not do it? Do you do wrong to Collins & Co. by concluding it? I think not. Are you practising any fraud on them by ending the contract? I think not. I desire, myself, to be liberal. If you believe the sworn statement of the officer of Mr. Collins that he is now behindhand $253,000, present a bill for the payment of that sum to him as a gratuity, and I shall be willing to vote for it. Present a bill to provide for buying his vessels, and I shall vote for it. Then, when you have done that, put out the contract to the lowest bidder to carry the mails, and in the end you will have saved more than half a million of dollars. I shall be as liberal, I think, as any man ought to be. I do not desire to drive Mr. Collins to an extremity, but I do protest against making any man the favored recipient of the benefits of this Government to the exclusion of every other. I admit the power, but I deny that it is a proper exercise of that power to say that one company shall have the monopoly of this mail, and that all other companies shall be denied any participation in or competition with it.

At the last session of Congress, a proposition was made in the House of Representatives to serve upon Mr. Collins the six months' notice required by the act of 1852, to discontinue the extra pay allowed by that act. In that House, seven months ago, on the naked, isolated, abstract proposition of discontinuing the extra pay of Mr. Collins, the vote stood ayes 85, noes 47; nearly two to one voting to conclude the extra pay. When that proposition came into the Senate, what occurred here? After that overwhelming vote of the House of Representatives, a motion was here made to strike out the clause giving the notice to Mr. Collins of the discontinuance of the extra pay. How did the vote stand here on the motion to strike out? Yeas 17, nays 15; exactly a quorum voting, and thirty Senators absent.

Mr. BAYARD. May I ask the honorable Senator what was the vote in the House?

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. Eighty-five for giving the notice, and forty-seven against it.

Mr. BAYARD. There were only one hundred and thirty-two members voting—one hundred absent.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. That was the vote in Committee of the Whole, and when they got into the House they did not even take the yeas and nays upon it. So decided, so unmistakable was the determination of the House to discontinue the contract that not even were the yeas and nays called. In the Senate the yeas and nays were taken on striking out the clause providing for the discontinuance of the extra pay, and the vote was yeas 17, nays 15, just a quorum. By this vote the Senate struck out the clause. A committee of conference was appointed. The House committee adhered to their proposition. The Senate committee adhered to the striking out. The committee of conference came back to the Senate, and a motion was made to recede. What followed? Upon a motion to recede the honorable Senator from New York [Mr. SEWARD] obtained the floor, and announced his purpose to speak until the last legislative moment of the session should expire, rather than allow the Senate to recede from the vote to strike out. My friend from Georgia [Mr. DAWSON] rose in his place and propounded a question to him as to how long he wished to speak. He said that he thought it would take him at least two hours to deliver his views on the subject; and there were just two hours of legislative time left. The Senator from California, [Mr. WELLER,] upon that announcement, rose in his seat and said that it was very obvious that the determination of the Senator from New York was that no vote should be taken, and he therefore moved that the Senate adjourn. The motion was agreed to, and thereupon the whole bill was lost. The friends of the Collins steamers preferred to lose the bill rather than give the Senate a chance to recede from their amendments.

Now, sir, what do we perceive? After that unmistakable expression of legislative opinion upon the part of the House, and I think upon the part of the Senate, at the last session, what do we see now? Seven months have rolled around and what new developments have we? What new testimony have we? What new feature presents itself? None; and yet we find the same House of Representatives, by a majority of seventeen on the yeas and nays, now not only refusing to give the notice, but actually repealing the power of Congress to give it for five years to come. That proposition is before the Senate, and we are asked to concur in it. The Senate may do it; they have a right to do it if they choose. All I have to say is, that, according to my convictions of propriety, I cannot consent to do it. I impute motives to nobody. I assail the action and purposes of no man. I do say, however, that this is a strange and extraordinary revolution in legislative and congressional sentiment. As for the rumors about influences outside or inside, I neither know nor care. I will never degrade myself by supposing that any man who is honored with a seat on this floor or in the other House will so far forget what is due to the dignity of his own character and the species to which he belongs, as to sell himself. I allude to the change of opinion as a strange circumstance, simply to prove that men, by influences proper and laudable, may be induced to change their opinion and action. Arguments, entreaties, appeals, and sympathy may, and doubtless have, performed their office.

Mr. President, I have now discharged myself of what I regard as a public duty in opposing this proposition. I am willing that every other Senator shall vote according as he thinks to be his duty. He, doubtless, will be content with so doing. I am content with this discharge of my duty.

Mr. BADGER. Mr. President, I avail myself of the privilege which my friend from Tennessee says he is willing to accord to every member of this body, of discharging a duty which belongs to us according to our own judgment. I shall vote, in regard to the pending proposition before the Senate, in accordance with the opinions I entertained on this subject in 1852, which I then took occasion to express to the Senate, and which I am not going now to weary the body by recapitulating. I rise, not for the purpose of prosecuting any discussion in respect to the various matters to which the Senator from Tennessee has alluded. I wish, however, to make one or two preliminary remarks before I advert to the particular purpose for which I have risen.

The honorable Senator from Tennessee speaks of this matter as if we were now called upon in the Senate to move in relation to the Collins line of steamers at the instance of the owners of that line. That, sir, is not the state of the case. We have received an appropriation bill from the House, containing a certain provision, which the Committee on Finance recommend to us to strike out; and in that way this question comes before us. Now, sir, I am opposed to striking out that provision, because I am satisfied, for one, that striking it out will produce no beneficial result to the country. I see no propriety in striking out the provision, because, in 1852, if I could have regulated the legislation of Congress, the particular provision which the Committee on Finance seek to retain would never have been on our statutes. But now, to understand the particular question to which I wish to call the attention of the Senate, and to which I wish to call it solely on account of the reference which the Senator from Tennessee has done me the honor to make to some remarks which I then submitted, or at least to an amendment which I then offered, it is necessary to recall the attention of the Senate to the state of this question.

In the first place, a contract had been entered into before the year 1852 with the owners of this line for a certain mail service, to be continued for a certain length of time, at a certain rate of compensation, with a power reserved to the Government to put an end to that contract by taking the ships at valuation. It was an agreement for a certain term, obligatory upon both parties during the continuance of the term. Previous to the legislation which took place here in the year 1852, an arrangement was entered into, by the proprietors of the line on the one side, and the Postmaster General and the Secretary of the Navy, in behalf of the Government, on the other, for putting in operation certain extra trips not contemplated by the original agreement—the original agreement being for twenty trips a year, and the arrangement with those public functionaries being for adding six trips a year to the original number, with the understanding between them that it was to be referred to Congress to determine if any, and what, additional compensation should be made. It was upon that state of the transaction that the question came before Congress which resulted in the legislation of 1852.

The amendment to which the honorable Senator refers, which I moved to the bill then pending, and which he seems to think is, in some respects, similar to the provision which was ultimately adopted, will be seen, upon a very brief statement, to be utterly unlike, in each and every particular, the provision which was actually incorporated into the bill. What was the state of the case? The Senate believed, upon the showing then made, that the prosecution of the contract, at the rate of $19,250 a trip, was being ruinous to the company engaged in it; that the company could not be held to execute that agreement on those terms without involving the utter ruin of the whole property invested in the enterprise. It was recommended by the Committee on Naval Affairs that an increase should be made in the compensation—to raise it from $19,250 to $33,000 a trip—an addition of $13,750.

It was proposed, and it was ultimately agreed, that there should be appended to that increase a proviso authorizing Congress, after a certain time, and upon a certain notice, to discontinue the provision for the increase of compensation; the effect of which would be that Congress, by discontinuing the agreement for that increase of extra compensation, would leave the original contract in full force for the whole term of years, binding the proprietors of the line to transport the mails at the compensation of $19,250 a trip, obliging them to retain the ships, obliging them to render the service, and, according to the information we then had, and according to the information that we now have, or at least that I have, obliging them to render a service to the Government by the ruin of themselves. To that measure, I, for one, was opposed; and I proposed the amendment to which the honorable Senator has referred, and which was perfectly just, fair, and equal, honorable to the Government, and not in the slightest degree injurious to the persons who were engaged in the contract. It was that Congress might, at any time, put an end to the entire contract, but that the Collins line in the mean time should be authorized to prosecute their enterprise with the steamers which they then owned.

Now let us see the first effect of that. The proprietors of the Collins line, under the original agreement, were bound to furnish five steamers. They had but four. The first effect of the amendment I proposed would have been to discharge the Collins line from the necessity of furnishing the additional steamer, an immense saving in point of money to them. In the next place, if the contract were altogether put an end to, they would be discharged from the necessity of further prosecuting their engagement with the Government; and, in the third place, the Government would have the steamers at a valuation, according to the original terms of the agreement between the Government and these contractors.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. Suppose that I was wrong. Now I understand the Senator to say that his proposition was that Congress should reserve to itself the power to close or discontinue the original contract—do I rightly understand him?

Mr. BADGER. Certainly.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. Then I ask the honorable Senator to offer that provision as an amendment to mine, and I will accept it. I should prefer it now to my own.

Mr. BADGER. The honorable Senator will excuse me. We are at present discussing the pending amendment. I am now speaking of the amendment which the honorable Senator brought up so triumphantly, with such an array of anticipating successful demolition, as showing that I was now opposed to what I then supported. I wish to show the honorable Senator that I supported then nothing which is at all inconsistent with what I support now. I proposed then that the Government should put an end to the whole contract; the company in the mean time receiving the increased compensation; the company in the mean time, while the contract continued, being released from the obligation of building the five steamers; and when the contract was ended, having their vessels disposed of to the Government of the United States at a valuation.

Now, sir, what is the proposal about giving notice? Why, it is this: They are to be held to finish the five steamers; they are to be held to carry on and prosecute the enterprise at $19,250 a trip; and if they fail to do it, they are to be liable to the Government in the consequences resulting from a violation of their contract; and if they escape, after suffering the consequences of that violation, they have upon their hands five steamers—five mighty steamers—five steamers the wonder of the world, as to strength and speed—deprived of any means of occupying them, for the prosecution successfully of the enterprise for their individual benefit, those steamers having been constructed under contract with the Government, expressly with a view to this enterprise.

Mr. President, the one proposition or the other may have been right or wrong. I am not discussing that; all I wish to show by the statement is, that they are radically different; that the proposition which I presented has no resemblance to the one which was finally adopted; and that I might, therefore, with great propriety, be in favor of annexing to the increased compensation the condition which my amendment proposed; while, at the same time, I should be opposed to reserving to the Government the right of discontinuing the increased compensation, and holding these persons to the discharge of the contract at a rate ruinous to themselves.

Now, Mr. President, I look upon this subject in a different view from the honorable Senator from Tennessee. He tells us about Mr. Vanderbilt, and what Mr. Vanderbilt would do, which I know nothing about. I care nothing about Mr. Vanderbilt. I do know, however, what has been done by the Collins line. I have reason to know the character of the ships they have furnished. I have reason to be satisfied that with those ships this enterprise has been sucessfully prosecuted. I have reason to be satisfied that, in this rival contest with Great Britain, these ships will achieve to us the victory. For my own part, independently of any other consideration, though there are many, I am not disposed, for the sake of saving the amount of money involved in this inquiry, to yield the advantage or success to our great commercial rival. I am, therefore, in the first place, opposed to the proposition of the Senator from Tennessee; and in the next place, I am opposed to the proposal moved at the instance of the Committee on Finance, and wish to retain the bill precisely in the shape in which it came to us from the House.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President, I had occasion, when this subject was before the Senate some years ago, to deliver my views upon it. I shall not now repeat them. I desire to say a few words, not on the general topics which have been brought into this debate, because there is no time for that, but specifically upon the amendment which has been offered by the Committee on Finance.

It seems to me to be the strangest view which can be taken of this subject—one which is unaccountable to me—that we are required by the bill as it comes from the House of Representatives, to delegate to the Collins line a very important influence over our marine, and the interests connected with it. If I understand the proposition of the Committee on Finance—I hope my friend from Virginia will correct me if I state it erroneously—it is that Congress shall retain the power to give the notice. On the other hand, it is contended by the gentleman from North Carolina, and those who act with him on this question, that the power of giving the notice shall be parted with, as provided for by the provision of the House. Here is a proposition that the Collins line of steamers shall be an agency to regulate this channel of commerce, under an irrevocable power of attorney, and not only an irrevocable power of attorney for the five years for which the contract is to subsist, but an irrevocable power of attorney with a vested interest. I do not know when I have been more surprised than I was when I heard such a proposition coming from the House of Representatives and advocated here. What is it? That the Congress of the United States shall part with all its control over this interest, whatever it may be, and delegate it to the gentlemen who form the company of Collins and his associates.

Now, sir, I do not care very much about the public Treasury. I am ready to bestow it upon almost any worthy object that will deprive Congress of the temptation of using it wrongfully. But, sir, I have no idea of making Mr. Collins's line, not a favorite pet child—that is not the expression, for it does not approach to that—but placing it in such a situation as to have all the rights of primogeniture. It is not that the Collins line shall share with the other children, but that she shall have exclusive favor, and the vested right of primogeniture, not dependent upon the discretion of the parent, if Congress be viewed as the representative of that parent, but vested by law in this company, with the right to do what? To take control of this mail communication for five years in a matter, as all acknowledge, connected with the public interests of the country. The proposition is, that those who compose this company shall have the delegated agency of taking from Congress the only responsible power to regulate this mail service. This is proposed under a contract procured—how? I make the broad declaration that the Collins line have never asked for anything which has not been granted; and they have increased in their demands every time. The whole of this policy has been crescit eundo. They have never come here when they have not come stronger and stronger. As to getting rid of them under any of the terms suggested, you might as well expect that they would give up feeding on the Treasury. Do they not regard the Treasury of the United States as a policy of insurance to them? Is it not to be their insurance office? Let gentlemen disguise the proposition as they please, it is nothing in the world but to convert the Treasury into an insurance office for the Collins line. If their funds depreciate, if a ship is lost, or any other catastrophe is suffered, you are called on to indemnify them. You are not only asked to indemnify them for the past, but I make a broader assertion and say that I have seen money voted here in this Congress in advance, without any estimates having been presented. I have seen money voted out of the public Treasury without an estimate, not to indemnify them for the past, but to secure them against probable loss in the future. When losses have occurred they have come here, and, not content with former contracts, have required new contracts, and they came stronger every time, until now the outrageous proposition is made to the Congress of the United States that we shall give up all jurisdiction over this interest, and delegate it to these gentlemen; that is to say, they are to have an irrevocable delegation of the power to control this interest for five years, under the assumption that they can do it better than anybody else.

Sir, allow me to say here, that, in my opinion, there is nothing so delusive, nothing so fearful in their temptations, as congressional contracts. I do not care where the remark hits. Congressional contracts are made with an intelligence that is remarkable, and they are enforced with all the energy of interest. I have hardly ever known a case where they have been successfully resisted. In this case, I have no hope that we can go beyond the amendment proposed by the Committee on Finance. It would be in vain to expect more. It would be striking against a fixed majority here. But, sir, when I am required to yield so far as to say, that these gentlemen are to have an irrevocable, delegated interest, not merely an agency, and that Congress cannot interfere with it without, in some measure, I suppose, jeoparding the great interests of the country, I cannot consent to it. If the Collins line had never been put into operation at all, I think we should have had, by this time, a competition in the mail service with Europe that would have been more certain and less dangerous to the country. I say, if you had not had this exclusive aristocratic monopoly, such would have been the result. I am told that the rooms of these vessels are splendid, and the hospitality of the owners of the line remarkable. I have nothing to say against that; but, sir, this is not only a monopoly fostered by this Government, but it is an aristocratic monopoly, and their vessels are fitted up most luxuriously. I said, on a former occasion, when it was remarked by some gentleman that these vessels could be converted into war vessels, that they would be much more like the barge of Cleopatra, carrying women and children across the ocean, in splendid style, than like the attributes of Minerva. I have no doubt these are good ships to run away with. No doubt, they might be very good ships to carry provisions, but I have no idea that they could engage successfully in battle. I have heard it said by a distinguished gentleman, that the ships of the Collins line in battle would be very much like a gallant, dashing horse, that could run into a fight, and run away again without trouble. Now, I want a ship that will stand and fight. This being always prepared for running, I do not think is one of the attributes of war. [Laughter.] If you tell me that you have a horse which can carry me quickly into the battle, and run away speedily, I say I would not have much reliance upon him. When I speak of a war ship, I mean a ship that can stand, and fight the battles of the country, not one that is ready to run away. [Laughter.]

Mr. President, I have already stated that all I struggle for on this occasion is the amendment proposed by the Committee on Finance. That is all I expect to gain; but I cannot consent, under any circumstances, to part with the power which we have, and give to these gentlemen a delegated agency with an interest, to have an imperium in imperio. I am ready to vote for the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee to give the notice; but so far as there is a contract, I will adhere to it, though it is a congressional contract.

Mr. RUSK. Mr. President, I do not mean to enter into this discussion at length; but I wish to say a word in answer to the honorable Senator from South Carolina. He deprecates the outside influences which are brought to bear in relation to contracts with the Government; and yet, sir, he votes directly for an advertisement to bring those outside influences to operate so far as they will be able to operate on Congress and on contractors with the Government; for, notwithstanding all that has been so eloquently said by the honorable Senator from Tennessee, I thought, when this power was reserved originally, that you were then presenting an inducement for the outside influences to which allusion has been made to come here. Here is the authority for Congress to give the notice, and there is an attempt every year to provide that the notice shall be given. Now, what is to be gained by keeping that question open? I understand the Senator from South Carolina to say that he despairs of giving the notice although he votes for it, but still he desires to reserve the right to Congress to give it.

Mr. BUTLER. It is as much as I expect to attain, but I would go further myself.

Mr. RUSK. Reserving that right is reserving a right to discuss the question over and over again, and it will be likely to bring here the outside influences, which are so much deprecated. The honorable Senator from South Carolina has chosen to say that the steamships of this line are gala ships, such as Cleopatra's barge, to run in and out of a fight at pleasure. Well, sir, he differs very widely from an English captain, and from the practice of the English Government, which has entered four times as largely as we have into contracts for ocean mail service.

Mr. BUTLER. Did any of them ever fight?

Mr. RUSK. Yes, sir; several of them. I have been as much necessity for speed in getting up to a fight at the right time, as I have ever seen to get away from it.

Mr. BUTLER. My friend knows so much about fighting that I am afraid he will have the advantage of me in that argument. [Laughter.]

Mr. RUSK. Well, then, sir, I will stop that branch of the argument. [Laughter.] The honorable Senator says this is a monopoly to one individual, and that he has no doubt that, if this contract had not been made, private enterprise would have covered the ocean with mail steamers much better than these, which would have run off the British.

Mr. BUTLER. I do not say that. I said that the other steamers ran fast enough for me. I do not see why you want to go so often.

Mr. RUSK. I will tell the honorable Senator why we want to go so often, and I know he will appreciate it. If ever this country gets into a war, our main reliance must be on our merchant marine. Our commerce is extending all over the world. Does the honorable Senator propose to protect that commerce by such an extensive naval armament as has loaded the British Treasury with an untold debt? Does he desire to put officers in commission to do nothing, add nothing to the trade and prosperity of the country, and to maintain them as a separate naval establishment? Does he not think it better to rely at sea upon the merchant marine, as on land you rely on volunteers and militia?

Mr. BUTLER. Will the honorable Senator allow me a word at this point?

Mr. RUSK. Certainly.

Mr. BUTLER. I deliberately say that, so far as regards war on land, though it may not be exactly the sentiment which accommodates itself to the popular taste, I would never wish to see troops sent into battle who were not under intelligent officers, well trained, and with a discipline that could be controlled with almost the certainty of horses and harness. As to your merchant marine going on the ocean, I tell you already, that I see that the very spirit, and the gallant spirit of our Navy, which fought our battles in the last war, has been brought down by the influence of commerce.

Mr. RUSK. Who, sir, were your gallant spirits that fought the last war? Who were the most of them? Not the men who wore epaulets, but the hardy sailor upon the merchant vessel; the man who had served before the mast, who knew the dangers of the sea, and whose sinews were made strong like iron by actual service; not those who went to your naval schools, and wore epaulets, and spent the most of their time on land on leave of absence. Sir, your merchant marine is what you have to look to in case of a naval war. It is covering every sea. It is the greatest protection you have, and the strongest bond at this moment for peace, especially with all the large commercial Powers. Why, sir, it is but a very short time ago since a proposition was made by a leading maritime and commercial Power to this country to do away with privateers in case there should be war. This shows the estimation in which our commercial marine is held by other Powers.

But, sir, to pursue the argument: the honorable Senator says this is a monopoly given to a particular individual. I say it is an encouragement given against the British monopoly. Is he ignorant of the fact that, prior to the establishment of our ocean mail lines, the British Government had fourteen or fifteen ocean steamers visiting every port of your whole country, and swarming upon the southern coast, covering the Caribbean Sea and the Gulf of Mexico. They were patronized out of the British Treasury. Could private American enterprise successfully compete with a merchant marine, a steam marine, fostered by the British Government? The introduction of steam into naval warfare will, in my judgment, produce wonders when there shall be another maritime war. Is it reasonable to suppose that private enterprise could successfully compete with a ship receiving from $16,000 to $20,000 a trip out of the British Treasury? No, sir; no such thing would have happened. The British vessels were not only taking all the carrying trade, and passenger trade, and the mails, between this country and Great Britain, but they were making a large amount of money from the immense compensation voted to them out of the British Treasury. They were making a large return to the British Post Office. Since your line has been established, they have used every effort to drive it off; and now withdraw the support which you have given to this part of your merchant marine, and very soon the monopoly will be in the hands of the British ship-builders and sailors, with all the consequences of a transfer of a large amount of capital and skill to the other side of the ocean, to be put into ocean mail steamers to depredate on your commerce whenever it may become necessary to the purposes of Great Britain for her to declare war on you.

The honorable Senator from South Carolina talked about not sustaining our own merchant marine. Will he vote to repeal the navigation laws? What are they but keeping British ships out of your coasting trade? Who opposes that monopoly? The honorable Senator from Tennessee says we are now voting a large tax out of the public Treasury. Well, sir, the navigation laws are voting a very large tax, not out of the public Treasury, but out of the pockets of his constituents, and of mine; and yet he does not propose to repeal them. They give a monopoly, just as this measure does, to American ships against British ships. In such a contest, I am for American ships.

But, sir, I shall not, at the present time, go into any argument in answer to the honorable Senator from Tennessee. My only object in rising was to answer the remarks made by the Senator from South Carolina. I shall lay before the Senate a few facts, and then I shall conclude what I have to say, for the present, at least. It is said that the owners of this line are making large profits. How that may be I am not fully informed. One thing, however, I take to be very certain, and that is, that they are incurring heavy expenditures. They receive from the Government $33,000 per voyage, and I find this statement of their average expenses per voyage for the last six months:

NEW YORK, February 22, 1855.

The expenses per voyage, of the steamers of this line, from New York to Liverpool and back, including repairs and insurance, for the past six months, average $65,347 79.

W. L. YOULE, Secretary.

Sworn to before me, the 22d day of February, 1855.

DANIEL SEIXAS, Notary Public.

It has been argued throughout as if the pay received by this line was a clear loss to the Government, when such is not the fact. I have a statement from the Post Office Department which shows that, for a voyage made in December, the gross amount of letter and newspaper postage received by the Department was $31,891 51. Everybody knows that the receipts to the Government from this line have greatly increased within the last year. My opinion is, they will continue to increase; and if so, the Government, in place of losing, will be largely the gainer.

Mr. HUNTER. I hope the honorable Senator from Tennessee will withdraw his amendment, and suffer the question to be first taken on the amendment of the Committee on Finance. He can renew his proposition afterwards.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I acquiesce in that suggestion, and withdraw my amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is, then, on the amendment recommended by the Committee on Finance, to strike out the proviso which has been read.

Mr. STUART. On that question I desire to ask the attention of the Senate for a few minutes. I confess, sir, that I rise to the discussion of the question with a great deal of hesitancy, and I think that, perhaps, an apology is due from me to the Senate for the manner in which I shall be able to treat it in the short time the Senate will be content to consider it.

Sir, I hope the Senate will pardon me for saying that I find myself embarrassed very much in the business of the body from the fact that my distinguished colleague, [Mr. CASS,] with great propriety, as I think, is relieved from all service on any committees. The consequence is, that additional labor is thrown on me to a very great extent, thus depriving me of the power of investigation, which I might otherwise possess. But, sir, there is a consequence which I regret still more than that: it compels me to appear in the discussions before the Senate much oftener than I should like to do. I make the statement now lest it might be thought that I was unnecessarily obtrusive.

Mr. President, I regard this question very differently from the opinion entertained by the Senator from Tennessee. I regard it as one of the most important questions that has been, or will be presented to Congress, in a national point of view. I think there are elements, purely national in their character, embraced in the contemplation of this subject; which should induce the Senate and the Congress of the United States to rise above all considerations resting on mere dollars and cents. I hope to show, during the few minutes I shall devote to that branch of the subject, that even in a pecuniary point of view, this arrangement with the Collins line, instead of being justly obnoxious to the censure which the Senator from Tennessee has dealt out upon it, has been one of the most beneficial arrangements that the Government ever entered into, and I shall seek to show that, both with reference to its effect on the Navy, and upon the postal service of the country.

Sir, I can very readily see that many Senators entertain a different opinion. I may fail entirely in the attempt. It may be, if I do, that it will be because the facts do not justify my opinion. It may also be on account of my incapability in presenting those facts properly to the Senate.

Now, sir, in the first place allow me to correct what seemed to be a misapprehension on the part of the Senator from Tennessee. Let me tell him that the Collins line never courted this arrangement. When the law was first passed asking for proposals for this service, this line made no offer; and it was not until all other sources had failed, and upon the especial invitation of the then Postmaster General, that this line made an offer at all. We have then one fact, that the commercial interests of this country desired intercourse between this continent and the other. They desired, of course, the best arrangement which was possible. There is the foundation of the proposition. The first arrangement which was entered into has been stated by the honorable Senator from Tennessee, with its terms and emoluments. I am not going to review it. In 1852 there was an increase of pay and an increase of trips.

The Senator's argument on that branch of the subject struck me as most remarkable. We find that the great commercial interests of the country were dissatisfied with the number of trips provided for in the original contract. They required more, and in order to have them additional compensation was necessary, and Congress gave it.

Mr. President, I have been always inclined to think that a review of the history of congressional legislation for the purposes of censure was, at all times, a task, not only difficult of performance, but, perhaps, of very doubtful propriety. Believing that, I shall not enter upon it. I say the additional compensation was given by Congress, and the number of trips increased. Now, let us see with what propriety that was done. Has the Government lost by the transaction? I shall seek to show you that the Government has been a gainer; and when I speak of the Government, I mean the people—those interested in the transmission of the mails across the Atlantic and back.

Before, however, I go into that question, I wish to refer to a position which the Senator from Tennessee occupies, and, I think, he will admit that the inconsistency which he has sought to charge on the Senate, and on Congress generally, and upon the Senator from North Carolina in particular, may be brought to bear very strongly upon himself.

Sir, it is but a few days since that honorable Senator, with others, enchained the attention of the Senate—and, it was repeated, again yesterday—with respect to the mail service on the Mississippi. It was objected at the Department to the proposals received for that service, that the price asked was enormous, that it was altogether beyond what the exigencies of the service would justify. The answer of the Senator and others, was that the service ought to be performed, no matter what the cost. That was the argument of the Senator from Tennessee, and of those honorable Senators who agreed with him in opinion on that question. I present it here at this time, not to dispute it, but to show its emphatic application to the question before us. The Senator from Tennessee says, however, that Mr. Vanderbilt will carry these mails at a very greatly reduced price, although he may be four or five days longer in doing it.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I did not say that; I said ten or twelve hours longer.

Mr. STUART. I understood the Senator to take the difference between twelve and seventeen days.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. Not at all.

Mr. STUART. No matter; the argument is the same. Will the commercial community be satisfied with anything except the fastest time? It is shown, it is capable of demonstration by figures, that the difference of time between the trips of the Cunarders and the Collins line makes a difference of $10,000,000 annually on the commercial transactions between England and America. Those transactions are $250,000,000. The difference of time between the two lines is one hundred and four days a year. The interest upon $250,000,000 for that time has to be paid by the commercial community, in the first instance, and in the second by the community at large. What, then, is the position of the Senator? To undertake, at this day, to make an arrangement which should lose only the difference of time between the Cunarders and the Collins time, we should sink to the great commercial interests of this country vastly more money than we are paying for the service. Is not that a consideration for the amount we pay for this rapid service?

Has anybody ever known anywhere where the internal arrangements in respect to the transmission of the mails have been tolerated by any portion of the community at a slow pace? Why, sir, it is an argument which meets us every day when we undertake to complain of the exorbitant demands made by railroad companies for the transportation of the mail, that there is nothing in competition with them, and that the community will consent to no slower transmission of the mails. If they ask $100,000, or $200,000, a mile, more than is a fair compensation, such is the force of the influence of the community at large upon the Department, that you are obliged to pay it. That ought to be a sufficient consideration for securing the fastest time, even at an apparent sacrifice, so far as the income from the mails is concerned. I show you that the saving of interest—only one item—to the commercial community on $250,000,000 each way, being the transactions between the two countries annually, is $10,000,000.

Sir, I may be mistaken, but the question seems to me to resolve itself into this: not whether the original contract was a good one, not whether the additional allowance was a wise one, but what is it wise for Congress to do to-day? I apprehend that if this were a power to give notice at the next presidential election by a vote of the people, it would not be considered a power of any great value; and, I think, I may assert, without any fear of contradiction, that it could be as well exercised in that case as it can by Congress. I assert, with all diffidence in respect to my opinions so far as they conflict with others, that just so long as this line performs its contract and its trips in a manner satisfactory to the public at large, and to the Post Office Department, you can never pass a law through both Houses of Congress to give the notice for discontinuing the extra compensation. The reason why you cannot do it is twofold. In the first place, it is a violation of the implied obligation of the Government. The power reserved in Congress to give the notice was not a power to be arbitrarily exercised without reason, because that would have prevented the making of the additional compensation at all. If Congress intended that they would give additional compensation for the additional trips, and would arbitrarily then repeal the law, it would be a reason for not passing that law, but none for giving the notice. This power, then, was reserved for this purpose, to be exercised by Congress whenever there should be ground of complaint against the performance of the contract on the part of the company. Whenever the company fails in such a performance of the contract as Congress had the right to expect, they are to give the notice. That is one reason why I say that under present circumstances Congress would not pass a law to give the notice. But there is another reason, and it is the fact that the enterprising interests of this country will brook no delay in the transmission of the mails anywhere.

Gentlemen seem to be surprised that there should be a feeling in the country against discontinuing this line, against crippling it in any degree, against doing anything which shall lessen the number of trips, or lessen the speed. Why, sir, it is the most natural feeling in the world. Not only has it been well said to-day that this line is the pride of the country; that it is the only thing now in operation which creates competition between this Government and that of England in a fair, civil race, and, therefore, enlists the heart of every patriotic American, but it addresses itself to the pockets of the country, and, in the point of view to which I have alluded, saves millions of dollars by the speed with which it performs its trips. Then, sir, you may well ascertain the reason why you find the country awake, and the Representatives of the country awake, to a continuance of this line, which presents at one view the admiration of the world while it largely increases the commercial income of the country.

Now, Mr. President, it is for that reason that I hold the power to give the notice utterly useless for good. If the company fails to comply with this contract in any essential particular, you can stop the pay without the notice, upon those principles of law which govern contracts between individuals. There cannot be a dollar of money drawn from the Treasury in the support of this line, after the appropriations are made, unless on the certificate of the Postmaster General. The money is drawn from the Treasury upon his certificate, and whenever the company fails to comply with its contract, he has the power to stop the pay. Of what use, then, is a power retained in Congress to give the notice? Why, sir, if you have the right to exercise it arbitrarily, without assigning any reason at all only because you choose to exercise it, that power could only be effective by placing it in the hands of an individual officer of the Government. If the law had named the Postmaster General, the Secretary of the Navy, or any other Executive officer, and given him the power to act, whenever his inclination should dictate, much as I should believe it was a right not within the purview of the contract, I should not vote to repeal it, because, in that case, it could be exercised; but in the present case it cannot be exercised in any instance where it is required, for, as I said, on a failure to comply with the contract, you can end it without giving this notice by Congress.

But, Mr. President, seeing that this power is not valuable for any purpose of good, let us see what are its capacities for injury to the public. It is for that reason that I shall vote to repeal it. What are they? In the first place, it pevents the proper performance of the duties of the line itself under existing circumstances; for who will come forward and expend $800,000 in building a ship when there is suspended over their heads this sword of Damocles to put an end to the contract, at any time so far as the additional compensation is concerned? We are told that Mr. Vanderbilt, or somebody else, will do this service. I consider that a mere effort to put an end to the contract, by making a subterranean offer to do it at a cheaper price, but capitalists will not invest their money in a business that is certain to lose. I say then that the consequence of retaining this power is to cripple the line. What is its effect upon Congress, upon the United States? What has been the experience of Congress so far?

Here I wish to call the attention of the Senate to a most remarkable argument of the Senator from Tennessee. He told us that at the last session of Congress the House voted, in Committee of the Whole—ayes 85, noes 47—to give this notice; and that that proposition was only rejected in the Senate by a vote of seventeen to fifteen. But when the very same Senate came together at this session, during the early weeks of the session, with the same bill standing over, there was not a single man in the Senate to demand the yeas and nays on postponing it indefinitely. The vote and the feeling on that point were unanimous. The honorable Senator from Virginia [Mr. MASON] made an argument to show that that bill contained a plain violation of the contract made with one of the companies; and yet, sir, it is argued here to-day against this measure that the House passed that by a vote of, ayes 85, noes 46, plainly violating what the honorable Senator from Virginia demonstrated was the contract with another company and arbitrarily giving the notice in this case. As I said before, when the Senate came together at this session, on fully and calmly reviewing the subject, that bill went by the board without a single objection. Now, is it not well to consider that the country was saved from such results—saved by the pertinacity of individual Senators here, suffering at the time, perhaps, somewhat in the opinion of their colleagues on this floor in resisting such a violatiation? What has now happened? The same House of Representatives has reconsidered the question, and the Senator thinks it most extraordinary that that House has, by seventeen majority, passed this bill, not only refusing to give the notice, but absolutely doing away with the power of Congress to give it without a reason. To my mind, the inference to be drawn from that is very different from what the Senator from Tennessee seemed to indicate. I say "seemed" to indicate, because he said he did not propose to inquire into the motives of anybody. Now I regard it as a careful review by the House of Representatives, and a change, radical and total, from an unathorized and unwise act, to a sound and sensible conclusion.

Sir, there has not been a measure before Congress which has not been—and I feel myself authorized to state from what I have seen here, that there will never be a measure before Congress which will not be—in some way affected by this power to give notice. It is impossible that it should be otherwise in the nature of things. Such is the feeling of the country, and that feeling is carried into both Houses of Congress, that when this line is attacked by outsiders, as it is, and undue influences are brought to bear on members of Congress, that attack is resisted. The consequence is, that parties are organized in Congress, they are thoroughly organized, for and against this arbitrary act. To gather strength, they do what everybody always does in Congress, that is, to make one question operate upon another, to rally just as much strength as you can. It turns out, therefore, that the whole legislation of the country is affected by the question of whether this notice shall be given or not. I wish to see it put out of the way. I have had too many measures crushed by it—measures in which my State was largely interested; I have seen, too, many other measures crushed by it. Sir, this power, which, as I said, is useless for good, which never can be exercised, is only kept here for the purpose of mischief. Then, on this point, we find that the Government of the United States is as much interested as the company is in doing away with this useless reservation.

Now, sir, I wish to say a few words in this connection as to the effect of this contract upon the Navy, because I think it the most important branch of the subject; and I thought so at the time when I voted for this increased compensation in 1852. What were the facts? Why, sir, every naval vessel which we had afloat on the waters was, for some reason or other, nearly worthless. There was hardly one that had not become disabled, and not in a condition to start out. I was satisfied that there was something radically wrong about that. I examined the reports of the Navy Department, and found that the opinions of that Department, as derived from their constructors and other officers, were always insisting that nothing would answer except the plan and policy pursued by their constructors, that a certain style of vessel was necessary for the Navy, and that that style was the one they had adopted. I saw that style constantly a total failure. Every appropriation of Congress for an addition to the Navy might as well have been sunk in the depths of the Atlantic. They were good for nothing, and I asked myself why? The answer that struck me was, that it was because private enterprise, private skill, and private ingenuity were excluded by the discipline of that branch of the Government. Sir, it is recorded upon our reports, it stands there to be as lasting as the reports themselves, that no vessel built outside of the Navy is fit for the naval service. That is the opinion of one of your officers.

I find, sir, that the opinion which I entertained is corroborated by high authority. I shall not read all the testimony which I have to sustain my opinion; I am content to mention the names of such men in our own country as Commodore Perry and Commodore Stewart in favor of the vessels of the Collins line as against the whole world as vessels of war. Let me read what Commodore Stewart says:

"PHILADELPHIA, January 18, 1855.

"DEAR SIR: In reply to your letter of the 16th instant, asking my opinion 'as regards the importance of great speed for vessels of war,' I beg to state that, in my judgment, there is no point more essential to vessels designed for war purposes, and intended for cruises on the high seas. In my opinion, it is the most important quality a cruiser can possess—a point so essential to her security from a superior force, or forces of an enemy, that it cannot be too highly estimated."

Let me call to this point the particular attention of the honorable Senator from South Carolina, who cannot understand the importance of this quality:

"On the other hand, where a vessel of war possesses this advantage, it accords to her the ability of overtaking her enemies, and subduing those of such force as her speed and armament would warrant her in encountering.

"The war of 1812, declared by the United States against Great Britain, exhibited examples of these characteristics not to be underrated, or how could it be possible for us to look back at that period of our history with the national satisfaction which we now feel, at the recollection of the hair-breadth escapes of our vessels of war from superior forces, owing entirely to the possession of this superiority, so skillfully seconded by the seamanship of those who controlled and conducted them, and who subsequently were crowned with victories over the vessels of their enemies through this advantageous quality in their ships, supported by their batteries, and the bravery of their officers and men.

"If a property so essential for enabling vessels, depending upon the elements for their powers of locomotion, and also to be successful in retreat from and victory over an enemy, does not constitute a consideration of the greatest importance, I should feel myself at a loss to imagine what other point could compensate for its absence, or render it one of secondary importance! Under this view of the subject, with regard to sailing vessels of war, its application to steamers seems quite as necessary to render them available and effective for similar purposes. Indeed, it is of infinitely more importance that they should possess it, as they are wholly independent of the winds as a motive power, and through the possession of this quality, would become so much more nearly on a par with one another.

"Your second question asks my views in 'regard to the steamers constituting the Collins line, so far as knowledge will warrant an expression with regard to their build and sufficiency for carrying an armament for war purposes.'

"On this score I cannot but admit that they are so; and I think that their performance in so frequently crossing the Atlantic without any complaining, or the occurrence of any accident which could have been foreseen, or anticipated, and guarded against in their construction, will fully justify this admission."

Now, let me turn the attention of the Senate to the testimony of Captain McKennon, of the British Navy, who was alluded to by the honorable Senator from Texas, because of the position of the man, and because of the language which he holds. He says:

"I am only doing justice to these magnificent vessels in stating that they are, beyond any competition, the finest, the fastest, and the best sea boats in the world. I am sorry to be obliged to say this; but, as a naval officer, I feel bound in candor to admit their great superiority. Their extraordinary easiness in a sea cannot fail to excite the admiration of a sailor; and I never beheld anything like it."

"From a considerable experience in all classes of steam vessels, besides the Cunard America, I advisedly assert that the Baltic is out and out, by long odds, the very best and easiest steamship I ever sailed in."

What has shed this light upon the world, and, I hope, upon the Navy Department of this country? It has been our furnishing to Mr. Collins, and the company associated with him, the power to build vessels which this British naval officer declares, in humiliation, in comparison with his own country, entirely the best vessels in the world. I hoped two years ago, when I voted for this additional compensation, and I hope now, that the thick shell which has, up to this time, seemed to cover the Navy Department, is broken through. I hope the windows are open and the light is shining in, so that we may have vessels which, instead of being mere scows upon the water, will be valuable and successful against the world. Sir, I beg leave to say to the Senate, as my humble judgment to-day, that if there never had been a dollar returned into the Treasury of the United States through the medium of postages from the Collins line of steamships during the whole term of its contract, we should have saved millions of dollars in its effect upon the Navy of the country. I may be mistaken, but this is my deliberate judgment.

Here let me ask the attention of the Senate for a few moments to what is a practical question, as I think, in the opinion of everybody; and that is, what are the receipts from this line? I think I can show, as nearly as is capable of being shown—it is not capable of exact demonstration, for the reason that we are not able to get at the entire facts—that this line is paying more money than is paid to it. Before I enter upon that question, however, I desire to make a single remark in reply to the Senator from Tennessee.

He has spoken of making an arrangement with another company which shall give us less trips, and he makes it appear that by so doing we should be gainers in a large amount of money. Why, sir, unless you compete with the Cunard steamers, you cannot keep up your postal treaty. Any gentleman who looks through the report of the Postmaster General will find that we are in the receipt of a large amount of money from the earnings of the Cunard steamers, in consequence of the postal treaty, which was not made until this Government determined to enter on this service. If you withdraw the Collins line, what will be done? Will the Cunard line continue to carry the mail and pay us a portion of the proceeds? Clearly not. The postal treaty provides that it may be terminated by either party on giving notice; and whenever we cease to be successful competitors with the English line, the Government of Great Britain will of course give the notice for the termination of the treaty, and take all the income from postages to itself, as it did before. Then, so far from your going on and having any income at all, with a slow line or an irregular line, or one with a less number of trips, you would lose your postal treaty and have nothing but what your own vessels carried. There is a large loss to begin with.

I now propose to show the manner in which the statements of the postage receipts from this line are made up, for the purpose of proving that they are exceedingly incorrect. The returns from the Post Office Department, in answer to a letter addressed by the chairman of the Post Office Committee of the other House, show that the amount received by the Baltic on her inward trip, arriving on the 27th of December, 1854, was $17,227 12. I should like very much if Senators would turn their attention to these figures, because they will show a very great miscalculation, if not misstatement, in the manner of making up the returns from these mails. It turns out, upon an actual investigation of the question, that there was received at the New York post office alone on that trip an amount equal to $17,983 03. It will be found, on an inspection of the statement made by the Postmaster General, that he gives no credit for the Boston, Philadelphia, and San Francisco mails. He has furnished only the receipts of the mail transmitted to and from the city of New York. If you take into consideration the mails from Boston, Philadelphia, and San Francisco, which are represented by competent authority to be one third of the whole, you have the sum of $25,504 37 as the postages on that trip of the Baltic. Looking at the return trip of the Baltic, going out on the first of January, 1855, as stated by the Postmaster General, the receipts are $12,064 57, while in fact the amount is $16,054 23. Then add the double letters, of which we get no account, and the revenues from a trip out and back are $55,411 30.

In getting at the facts we find that we have returned from the Post Office Department nothing but what is received at the New York post office, which includes the Canada closed mail and New York mail itself. Mails are also made up at Boston and Philadelphia, and sent in bags to New York, and at New York are put on board the vessels without any account being taken of them, and when they are returned the same thing is done. Besides, the California mail is treated by the Postmaster General as a closed mail under the treaty. The agreement in the treaty is that the closed mails are to be estimated by the ounce. Those are the mails from the continent of Europe; and it is agreed that they are to be estimated by the ounce. The Postmaster General here treats the California mail as a closed mail, but if you take the difference between that mail by weight and by the piece, you find it to be a very great one.

I say then, on the best figures which we can get—and let me tell the Senate that they are obtained from sworn statements from the city of New York, with the best lights which can be obtained—these vessels, since last December, are paying more money, in the shape of postages, than we are paying for them. What is the reason for this increase? It is known to everybody that a portion of the Cunard line has been withdrawn, so that the Collins line is now regularly alternating with it. Before that portion of the line was withdrawn, the British Government were in the constant habit of withholding the mails from our line and sending them by the Cunarders, and they made such regulations that the mails from the continent of Europe reached England just in time for the Cunard steamers to this country. We have now a decided and fixed advantage growing out of the present arrangement—and is this a time to lose it? Is this a time to take a step which shall lose the advantage that we have been years in obtaining?

I shall not detain the Senate—because I did not rise for the purpose of making an elaborate speech on this subject—in commenting on the statements made by the Senator from Tennessee. He has presented us with an estimate made by a Mr. Bell, of New York, in reference to the amount of freight and passenger money received by these ships. That Mr. Bell has been seeking through the custom-house for the purpose of ascertaining the number of passengers, and he says that he "conceives" there are as many passengers going out as there are returning. I beg leave to conceive that he is very much mistaken. I undertake to believe that the amount of travel from the continent of Europe this way is vastly greater than the travel the other way; and there is no vessel that sails which carries out as many passengers as she brings back. That is my belief; and yet Mr. Bell's opinion is based on that datum. What have we to answer to that? We say that, so far as the argument is concerned, the Senator from Tennessee has furnished the answer himself. He has answered it by the sworn statement of the secretary of the company, who, giving the income and expenditures, says the company is in debt. Mr. Bell makes out an immense income every trip, but he estimates the expenses of a trip much below what they really are. I could read to the Senate, if it were necessary, the facts alluded to by the honorable Senator from Delaware which show conclusively that $12,000 are added to the expense of a trip on account of the increased speed of these vessels over the Cunarders, while the increased pay we allowed them in 1852 is $13,750.

Are not these advantages? It seems to me that they are advantages which the country ought to retain, and I think there ought not to be an effort made here to-day arbitrarily to give this notice to stop this compensation, and let the consequences take care of themselves. Sir, I never believed in that course of conduct in individual enterprise. I believe just as little in it in a Government enterprise. Let us consider the consequences which are to grow out of the act that we are about to perform. That, I think, is the part of wisdom. Now, the question is, is it desirable that this company should go on and build a steamer better than any other that has ever been built, or is it proper to stop this line as it is? The British Government has not been sleeping upon this question, but they now have a steamer on the stocks, the Persia, which is not yet completed, which is being built for the purpose of outstripping the Collins line. Will they do it? They have every advantage. They have the opinions of all their engineers and officers as to the defects in the existing vessels. They have every opportunity in modeling a new vessel to excel everything that has yet been built.

But, Mr. President, the enterprise of this country possesses a similar advantage. Shall we deny it the opportunity. Will the Government of the United States reap the benefits, or throw them away? Shall we be placed in the humiliating position, by refusing a mere matter of justice, of having these vessels turned on our own shores and against our own people, in the interest of a foreign enemy, if we shall ever get into a contest with a foreign enemy? Or shall we have the advantage of using them ourselves? Sir, if that period of time ever does arrive, I apprehend there will be as great a change of opinion on the part of the Senator from South Carolina and the Senator from Tennessee as there has been in the opinion of this Congress between the last and the present session. We shall then see, and see with the full force of suffering, what is the advantage or disadvantage of the position in which we may be placed.

Mr. President, I have given a very imperfect statement of the facts of the case, much more imperfect than I should have been glad to make; but at this time in the day, and with the impatience of the Senate, I am far from having a desire to talk either to Senators or to empty benches. I have said enough to justify my own action. I know that I have done but imperfect justice to the subject itself; but I hope, sir, that able hands, those who have examined the subject more carefully, will discuss it, if it is to be further discussed to-night, and that not only Congress, but the country will be enlightened in respect to this great question, for great I believe it to be.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. Mr. President, I supposed, from the advertisement made by the Senator from Michigan, when he commenced his remarks, that all the figures and facts which I presented to the Senate were to be assailed and demolished. I do not, however, feel that he has successfully attacked any main position which I assumed. He commenced by the assertion that Mr. Collins had not taken the initiative in this matter. Then, I ask the Senator to tell me who did take the initiative? I put the question to him: how did Mr. Collins get the contract?

Mr. STUART. I said before that Mr. Collins was requested by the then Postmaster General to make an offer.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. Where does the Senator find that? Will he refer me to it?

Mr. STUART. I have the letter of the Postmaster General among the papers before me.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I have no letters; all I have to refer to is the archives of the country. I find upon the record the first evidence of this matter in a proposition made by Mr. Collins himself to carry the mail between New York and Liverpool. I know nothing as to what letters may have passed between Mr. Collins and other men; and I have no right to know anything about them. I have Mr. Collins's proposition dated March 6, 1846, in which he asked Congress to give him a contract on the terms which he stated; and Congress did so.

The honorable Senator says, however, that he does not exactly see the propriety of a review of legislation; he thinks that, to say the least, it is of very doubtful policy. Why, Mr. President, do you keep a record at all? Why do you keep a Journal? Why do you pay thousands and tens of thousands of dollars to those honorable young men to sit there and record the transactions of the Senate? Is it not to make up a record which shall live when we have passed away? I am not surprised that the honorable Senator does not exactly see the policy of it, because records are sometimes dangerous things. I rejoice that there is a record; I rejoice that a freeman has the right to turn to that record, and hold to their just responsibility the men who take part in forming it. I look to the record? Where else shall I look? To that evanescent sentiment which is one way to-day and another to-morrow? Shall I look for a true, sound, or correct judgment upon an opinion solemnly formed under the responsibilities of an oath to-day, and to-morrow reversed under the same solemn sanctions? No, sir; I prefer to go to the record. Beautiful speeches are very fine things. When I was a boy I was induced to believe that when a man attempted to speak he might safely rely on the vivid fancies of his imagination, and the beautiful adornments of rhetoric; but age has convinced me that one stubborn fact is worth all the sophistry which the imagination of man can bring to bear on a question. In arguing this question I have endeavored to confine myself strictly to the point, to the facts of history, to the record, and to the figures. If gentlemen do not like this, it is not my fault. The record is here. If it is wrong attack it; if I am wrong in stating the record, attack my error; but do not attack the great principle of turning to the record to ascertain what the opinions of public men have been. I shall not say it is the only safe-guard, but I will say it is the greatest safe-guard which we have against legislative profligacy. Abolish your records, burn up your Journals, banish your reporters; and legislative licentiousness will run riot in the Halls of the Congress of the United States.

Although the honorable Senator deprecates a reference to the record, he attacked my consistency by reference to the record. That is perfectly legitimate. I have never objected to being called to a strict account for my public conduct. Those who know me know that I never evade it. When I am guilty of committing an error, I think I have sufficient manliness and magnanimity to retract it. I do not complain of the Senator's attacking me by referring to the record, though he opposes the practice of doing so. How did he seek to prove my inconsistency? Why, said he, the Senator from Tennessee—alluding to myself—but the other day, made appeals upon this floor, against the wrongs perpetrated by an officer of this Government in not giving mail facilities to the valley of the Mississippi. What has that to do with this question? Congress passed a plain enactment, and repassed it, but an officer of the Government refused to execute it on the pretext that the price was too high. That is not the question here. The question is not whether it is too high or too low, but whether this is the best contract you can make. If the Collins bid is the lowest and best bid, take it; but if there be a lower and a better bid, take that. That is all we ask for the valley of the Mississippi; but we cannot get it.

Mr. President, the gentlemen on the other side of the question are still harping upon the speed of the Collins vessels, and the Senator from Michigan has told us that is everything. He imputed to me an argument which I never used as to time, because it is known to everybody that the Cunarders were never beaten by any such amount of time as is intimated by the Senator. What is the speed of the Collins line over the Cunarders? There is a difference of opinion about it; but I believe the highest time claimed is about eleven or twelve hours. I said that the proposition of Mr. Vanderbilt was to run up to the Cunard time. I said further, that I felt myself authorized to say, that if speed was deemed so important, Mr. Vanderbilt would contract to carry the mails in the same time that Collins carried them, for the sum of $19,250 a trip, the amount of the original contract of Collins. Then what is the use of talking about this speed, unless you impeach the capacity of Mr. Vanderbilt to perform the service, or his ability to offer good security? If you attack that, there is something in the argument; but he proposes to run up to the Cunard time for $15,000 a trip, and he is willing to run up to the Collins time for $19,250 a trip, so that the argument about time will not avail anything.

Mr. BAYARD. Will the Senator from Tennessee allow me to make a suggestion in reference to that matter?

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. Yes, sir.

Mr. BAYARD. This bill, when it was before the House of Representatives, was very much discussed, and I believe very great differences of opinion existed there. Mr. Vanderbilt's offers were before the House. The bill came into the Senate; and then on the table of every Senator here, I believe, was placed a printed proposition, signed by Mr. Vanderbilt, which does not embody any stipulation as to time. The honorable Senator from Tennessee tells us now, nearly at the close of the session, that Mr. Vanderbilt will make the Cunard time for $15,000 a trip, and the Collins time for $19,250 a trip; but what guarantee have we for that? The honorable Senator cannot control him. No such proposition is made by the honorable Senator himself; he does not act as the agent of Mr. Vanderbilt. What guarantee, then, have we, knowing that Vanderbilt has been opposing this bill, that the sole object of this apparent offer of his is not simply to defeat this legislation, and then let Congress provide for the service in the best way they can?

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I am very happy to answer the Senator from Delaware. I am not the agent of any man. Thank God, I never mean to be. I did not announce that I was the agent of Mr. Vanderbilt, or had charge of his interests; but I announced, and I did it by authority, because I had it from Mr. Vanderbilt himself, that in making the proposition he endeavored to copy the proposition of Mr. Collins, giving to himself just the contract which Collins got. I was met by the argument that he might take fifteen days to run the trip, and I asked him, "Is that what you mean?" "No," said he, "I mean to run up to the Cunard time; but if Congress wish to run it faster, if they wish to run up to the Collins time, let them add the price between what I have proposed and that originally paid to Collins, and I will run up to the Collins time."

Mr. RUSK. Will the honorable Senator allow me to interrupt him for a moment? I do not see any rivalship between the two.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I do not pretend that there is; others make the issue.

Mr. RUSK. But the honorable Senator said that Mr. Vanderbilt has made the same proposition which Mr. Collins made. Mr. Vanderbilt's proposition has been laid upon our tables; and so far as he has said anything to me about it, the printed proposition is the only one of which I know anything. I desire to inquire if Mr. Vanderbilt has authorized the honorable Senator from Tennessee to say that he will build his ships of a particular size, and under the control and direction of the Navy Department? That is a vast item of expenditure.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. That is not the point I am debating. The question made upon me was in regard to time. I hold now, in one hand, Mr. Vanderbilt's proposition, and in the other, Mr. Collins's proposition, and I say they are identically the same as to the question of time. Whether Mr. Vanderbilt will build his vessels under the direction of the Navy Department, I do not know; I have not inquired; I have not sought Mr. Vanderbilt or anybody. I take the propositions as they appear on the record, and I say they are both identical as regards the question of time. Mr. Collins proposed to carry the mails twice a month, and Mr. Vanderbilt proposes to carry them twice a month. I stated further, that Mr. Vanderbilt told me, when I put the question to him, "in what time do you propose to run?" that he would run up to the Cunard time for $15,000, and up to the Collins time for $19,250 a trip. I do not suppose it is material whether the vessels be built under the direction of the Navy Department or not. According to the argument of the Senator from Michigan and the Senator from Delaware, the question simply is as to time; and I care not whether Mr. Collins, or Mr. Vanderbilt, or an officer of the Navy, shall supervise the construction of the vessels. If time is all you need—and that is all you seem to desire—then meet me on that argument.

The honorable Senator from Michigan says that to give notice for the discontinuance of the extra compensation to this line, would be a violation of implied faith. How the Senator arrived at that conclusion is a matter of astonishment to me, because the very law upon which we are now proposing to legislate, provides that Congress may discontinue the extra allowance after the 31st of December, 1854, on giving Mr. Collins six months' notice. What implied faith there is I do not know. Certainly it is not in the contract; it does not appear upon the record; and I have no right to suppose that there is any implied obligation not written or communicated to the country.

But, sir, the Senator from Michigan says that Congress will never give the notice. That may be so. If that be so, you may just as well close this debate, and take the vote. But by what authority does that honorable Senator make the announcement? How can he know what Congress will or will not do? Are we to be driven from the faithful discharge of our duty, as we understand it, by a declaration that it will never be done? Why, sir, with my convictions of duty, if I knew that I stood solitary and alone upon this floor, with no Senator to vote with me for giving the notice, I should dare to enter my protest. Congress, we are told, will never give the notice, and the Senator has stated reasons why they will not. He has gone further, and stated reasons why they should not. I shall not, at this late hour, undertake to answer that particular branch of his argument. If I had time and strength, I should be happy to do so. Whether they give the notice or not is wholly immaterial to me. I mean that my constituents shall know that I have not stood by silently and seen $33,000 taken out of the Treasury at every trip of these steamers to pay for mail service, when another man was willing to do the same service for half that money. As long as I hold my place here, I shall dare to discharge my duty according to my convictions. I care not for the outside influences which may be brought to bear, nor do I care for that storm which may be arising, nor the assumption of that public sentiment to which the Senator has alluded.

I respect an enlightened public sentiment, but I despise a public sentiment manufactured for unholy purposes, and by unholy means. I am not to be driven by popular feeling one inch further than I think is right. I shall always bow to an enlightened public sentiment, but I know no such sentiment as the Senator speaks of. I feel there is no such public sentiment as he has intimated. I do feel, and I do know that there is a sentiment in this city which is pressing on us. I have felt it in my own person. I do not speak about others; but I know that importunities and entreaties, long and powerful, have been, and are constantly made. For that sort of public sentiment I care not. It has no terrors for me.

But, Mr. President, the Senator has said that, so far from this contract being a losing business, the Government has actually made money by it. How does he attempt to prove that? He has presented a statement of the amount of mails delivered in New York by some one or more trips of one of these vessels, and then he argues that the amount of mail matter which went to Philadelphia, and Boston, and California, might amount to so much, and thus he makes up his conclusions. Anticipating all these things, I addressed a note, a month or six weeks ago, to the Postmaster General, in which I asked him to furnish me with a statement of all the moneys which had ever been paid to Mr. Collins by the Government, and also to furnish me with a statement of all the moneys which had been received into the Treasury of the United States from these vessels.

Has the Senator any better statement than that? If so, he has some other means of arriving at it than I have. I know nowhere else to go to for such information but the Department here. Its officers are sworn officers of the Government. They keep the books, and if anybody does know the facts, they must know them. Have they certified to a falsehood or not? If they have certified to a falsehood, convict them, and turn them out of office; but, if what they certified be the truth, let the truth be spoken. I have before me a statement from the Post Office Department of the amounts of money paid to the Collins steamers, with the date of each payment, and the whole amount paid. The recapitulation of the whole amount paid to them, under the contract, sums up $2,838,406 57. Three hundred and eighty-five thousand dollars were advanced by act of Congress, and of that sum there has been refunded by ten per centum instalments $154,000, leaving a balance chargeable to them on that account of $231,000. Adding this to the amount paid under their contract, we have a total of $3,069,406 57 paid to this line. On the other side, the question is, how much have we received? The total postages brought by the Collins line amount to $1,049,059 85, of which the United States portion is $931,087 14.

I have the letter of the Postmaster General accompanying these statements, and indorsing them. Whether they are true or false I do not know, but they are here. Gentlemen are welcome to take them, and dispose of them as they please. It appears, from these statements, that you have paid out upwards of $3,000,000, and have got back less than $1,000,000. In the face of this startling fact, we are told that this is a profitable investment to the Government; that we have made money by it; and that it ought to be continued. If so, the Postmaster General is either a corrupt or an incompetent man, and he ought to be turned out of office.

Mr. STUART. I did not say that we had made money out of the transaction, in the way of postages. I simply stated what had been the effect of drawing off a part of the Cunard steamers; and I said that from that time, (from the facts I had been able to get at,) and I referred particularly to the period from the 27th of December last to the present time, there was being paid into the Treasury from this line, more money than was being paid out under the contract. Nor, sir, did I say that the Postmaster General was corrupt, or his statements false. I said he did not give us, in his estimate, the amount received from the Boston, Philadelphia, and California mails, and only stated those of New York. I said that in the instances where he did give the California mails, he treated them as closed mails under the contract with Great Britain, whereas they should not be treated as closed mails at all.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I did not charge the Senator with having imputed to the Postmaster General corruption, and I did not expect him to charge that officer with it; but I did say that his statement was either true or false; and if false, I charged the Postmaster General with corruption. If it be false, he is either corrupt or incompetent. What does he say? The paper is headed: "Statement showing the total amount of postages received on mails conveyed by the Collins line of steamers from the 27th day of April, 1850, to June 30, 1854, also the portion thereof belonging to the United States." The total is $1,049,059 85, of which the United States portion is $931,087 14. Then we have received into the Treasury less than $1,000,000, though we have paid out upwards of $3,000,000. That is what I said.

The honorable Senator from Michigan said the question is not whether Congress will give the notice or not; that, he says, they will never do; but whether we shall surrender all the power and control now, and at all times, until the end of the contract, to close it; whether we shall surrender ourselves at the footstool of Mr. Collins and company for the next five years; or whether Mr. Collins and company shall go on to build another vessel. The question is whether this company shall be required to build another vessel, or whether we shall withdraw the power to conclude the contract. If that is the question, I am prepared now to settle it according to my judgment. Does not the contract of Mr. Collins call for the building of another vessel? Was he not required originally to build five vessels? Has he ever done it? He never has. When the honorable Senator alluded to the naval feature of the question, I think he forgot that one argument which was used at the time of making the contract was that it was strengthening the right arm of the Navy, and yet one fifth of all that virtue is lost. Mr. Collins has been permitted to go free from that day to this without ever being compelled to build the fifth vessel? Why was not he compelled to do it? Did he not know that five vessels were necessary to perform the service? He must have known it. The contract provides that he should build five, and that the fifth vessel might be used by the Government of the United States on paying for it. Still he is suffered to violate his contract, to build only four ships instead of five. The fourth vessel has been lost, and he has now but three, and he refuses to build that vessel unless you will obligate yourself to continue to him, and his company this exorbitant price for five years to come. He bound himself to build five vessels. He never built more than four. He has now only three.

Mr. STUART. I beg leave to call the attention of the Senator to the fact that the company was relieved from building the fifth vessel.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. Where does the Senator find that?

Mr. STUART. I can show it to the gentleman.

Mr. MALLORY. Mr. President, I was not aware that this question would come up to-day, and I have not arranged, therefore, in my mind, as succinctly as I ought to have done, the facts which I deem it necessary to say to the Senate.

Mr. CLAYTON. Senators have been in session, in committees and the Senate, to-day nearly eight hours, and, as a matter of course, they are exhausted. I move, therefore, that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. HUNTER. I hope not.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. PETTIT.) The question is not debatable.

Mr. HUNTER. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 13, nays 32; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Bell, Butler, Chase, Clayton, Dawson, Fessenden, Morton, Pratt, Sumner, Thompson of Kentucky, Wade, and Wilson—13.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Badger, Bayard, Benjamin, Brainerd, Bright, Brodhead, Brown, Cooper, Dodge of Wisconsin, Douglas, Evans, Fitzpatrick, Geyer, Gillette, Gwin, Hunter, James, Johnson, Jones of Tennessee, Mason, Pettit, Rusk, Seward, Stuart, Thomson of New Jersey, Toombs, Toucey, Walker, Weller, Wells, and Wright—32.

So the Senate refused to adjourn.

Mr. MALLORY addressed the Senate in opposition to the provision for the Collins line. His remarks, withheld for revision, will be published hereafter.

Mr. TOUCEY. That the Senate may be assured that it is not my intention to tax their patience, I shall confine myself to the question which is pending before them. The discussion, with regard to the capability of the Collins steamers for warlike purposes, appears to me not to be necessary to dispose of the subject which is under consideration. It comes too late. It would have been a proper subject for consideration when Congress, many years ago, ordered the contract to be entered into, which now exists between this Government and the company. I am not now to believe that the Navy Department and the principal officers of the Government of that day were so entirely ignorant of the matters that they had in charge that they entered into a contract which cannot now be vindicated; which, according to the views of some gentlemen, it would be disreputable to them to suppose they should have engaged in at all. On the contrary, I believe that the policy which was then adopted under the existing circumstances, was a sound public policy, and that the results which have flowed from that policy, in the position which this country now occupies in reference to every Power in the world, fully justify the policy. It is enough for me to say that the contract has been made, and, for one, I shall not consent, so far as my vote is concerned, to violate the public faith by disturbing the contract.

The House of Representatives has now passed a bill proposing to make a new contract. I am not willing, at this late day, to enter into a new contract with this company, or any other, upon this policy. I think the policy has already accomplished the results which were designed, and when we get through, fairly, honorably, and consistently with the public faith, with our present engagements, I am opposed, for one, to renewing them in any quarter. I propose, then, to leave the whole subject to the constituted authorities and to private enterprise.

But, sir, what is now proposed? In 1852 we enlarged the compensation of the Collins line, but the enlargement was conditional. We reserved to Congress the power to terminate the contract, on six months' notice, after the lapse of two years. The two years have elapsed, and it is proposed that we make the contract absolute to run through the whole term, and bind the Government to give the present compensation through the whole term of the contract, and give up the right and power which we have to terminate the continuance of that part of the compensation which was added in 1852. I am not prepared to do this. It is not what we should do in any transaction of our own. We should be wanting in fidelity to ourselves, now, while acting for the public; we should be wanting, in my judgment, to the public interests, if we were now, without consideration, to abandon our present control over this important public matter. I am opposed to it.

What reasons are assigned for this proposition? I have heard none, except that Congress will be importuned to do this, year after year, until it is done. That is to say, we are called upon now to surrender unconditionally, and to give everything that is demanded, because we shall be importuned. Sir, I never, for one, yield to any demand that is made upon me on any consideration of that kind. I think it is no reason why we should yield. I believe it is the bounden duty of Congress to retain this power over this arrangement from a variety of reasons which will readily suggest themselves to the mind of every Senator. If the company disregard the contract, use this power. If they do not come up to the contract which they have entered into according to the utmost good faith, exercise this power which we have reserved, and which we can exercise upon any reason satisfactory to ourselves. I am, therefore, entirely unwilling to make a new contract at this time, and make absolute that portion of the contract, which is now conditional.

I have another reason. I have looked into the documents and papers which have been presented, and I do not find any statement of the receipts and expenditures of this company during the past year, or since the partial discontinuance of the Cunard line of steamers. I know not what is the state of the receipts as well as the disbursements of this company for the last year; and without that information I cannot exercise a sound judgment whether it be right, politic, or just to make any change in the contract for the benefit of the company.

While, therefore, on the one hand, I would uphold the contract that has been made in good faith to the utmost letter, and in the fair spirit and intention of the contract on the other, I would not give up, nor, by my vote, consent that the Government should give up the control which has been reserved to itself upon this subject.

Mr. BAYARD. Allow me to say to the honorable Senator that a statement which has been made here shows the receipts and expenditures of the company up to February, 1855.

Mr. TOUCEY. But what is that statement? Does not the honorable Senator from Delaware discover what it is? It embraces the expenditures from the commencement of the company down to the present time in gross. In the early stages of the company, the expenditures may have been very large and the receipts very small; but during the past year, the expenditures may have been comparatively small and the receipts very large.

Mr. BAYARD. The expenditures must have been necessarily large last year, because every one knows that there was a great increase in the price of fuel and of labor.

Mr. TOUCEY. It is true the expenditures may have been large; but what I wish to know is the proportion between the expenditures and receipts at the present time. That is the material consideration, and on that subject I see no light.

But, Mr. President, it is said that an enterprising citizen has offered to make a contract with the Government to do this service for much less. Suppose he has; we are not at liberty to enter into any contract with him. Well and safely may he make the offer, because we have no right, consistently with the faith which we have pledged to the owners of the Collins line of steamers, to enter into any contract with him. That consideration, therefore, has no influence upon my mind.

While a portion of the Senate and House of Representatives may be inclined to make a new contract, I am opposed to it. On the other hand, a portion of the members of this body are in favor now of terminating the allowance which was made in 1852. My answer to any proposition of that kind is, that no such proposal comes from the Committee on Finance, or from any committee of this body. In the next place, we know, as far as we can know anything, that the other branch of Congress, so far from concurring in any proposition of that kind, go to the opposite extreme—that of giving up the power entirely. Does any practical man, then, suppose that it is of the least importance now to bring forward a proposition to terminate the extra allowance? We know that the House of Representatives will not concur in any such proposition as that while it is composed of the present members. I ask, then, again, of what importance is it to bring forward a proposition of that kind by those who are friendly to it, unless there is an advantage in bringing it forward and having it defeated? Now, sir, I have been accustomed, myself, in political and all other action—if there was an object which I wished to accomplish—to bring forward that object at a time when there was a chance to succeed, and not when inevitable defeat was to await it.

In opposition to both the extreme opinions which I have stated—on the one side, of terminating the contract so far as the extra allowance is concerned, and on the other, of giving up the power which we have reserved over this company, and over this contract with the Collins line—the Committee on Finance have proposed that course which is between the two extremes. It is simply this: We owe the company money which is embraced in this bill; we are willing to pay it, without a proposition to make a new contract, and without a proposition to terminate any part of the old contract. Is not that the course which is required by true and sound policy? Why should we embark in a debate on this subject at this time, when the company has undoubtedly met with a great disaster in the loss of one of its vessels? Is this the time when we should make war on that company? It is certainly not the time which I would select for the purpose. The company is also deriving a great benefit now from the partial discontinuance of the Cunard line. There is a benefit which may, in a degree, compensate for that loss. Why, then, not take that course which seems to be dictated by the faith which the Government owes to the company, and by what we owe to the public interest, in upholding this line to a reasonable and proper extent, and appropriating the money that is due to it unconditionally and without any embarrassment. I confess that is the course which commends itself to my mind, and seems to have met with the approbation of the Committee on Finance, to whom this subject was committed by the Senate.

These are the views which control me. Without detaining the Senate longer, I simply express the hope that, before we adjourn, the Senate will see fit to concur in the amendment which has been proposed by the committee without embarrassing itself with any other discussion, or any other proposition.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I shall detain the Senate but an instant. I understand the Committee on Finance to have reported in favor of striking out so much of the bill as repeals the privilege to give the notice. That is less satisfactory to me than any proposition that could have been made. I think we ought either to give the notice at once, and be done with the subject, or the privilege of giving the notice should be repealed, and thus get rid of the question. By leaving it in a state of uncertainty we compel the parties to come here each session, and the whole subject is opened to the injury of the public business to a greater amount than is here involved. Although opposed to this increase of pay when it was given, I infinitely prefer the passage of the bill as it came from the House of Representatives to the amendment reported by the Committee on Finance. That is all I deem it nececessary to say.

Mr. TOOMBS. I have but a few words to say on this subject; I believe I should not have said them but for the remarks of the Senator from Illinois. Everything that is done, every obstruction, every interference with the public business is thrown upon the public and for the benefit of this company. I desire, therefore, to some extent to inquire into their claims for such attention as this at the hands of Congress. The Senator says he wants to get rid of the subject; that every session it comes up here causing the public business to suffer more than the value of the money which is involved in it. Who comes up here? Why, this rapacious company which complies with no single obligation that has ever been imposed by the Government, which comes up here by all sorts of means, except honest ones; by all sorts of means except fair means; which comes before the Legislature without complying with it, to get rid of the first stipulation which was made, and to get increased to a most enormous and shameful extent the amount allowed to them by a contract made with them on the part of this Government. Therefore, sir, I desire to go to some extent into the history of this whole business.

I thoroughly approve of the remarks made by the Senator from Tennessee. His facts are true. They are proved by the record to be true. They are unassailed. Pretexts and excuses, not reasons, are used for the purpose of sustaining this line here, and throwing away millions of public money, and I suppose to save these gentlemen, and the public time, the expense of defending this ill-gotten contract! The Committee on Finance propose to do what? To strike out the provision of the House repealing the power to give the notice; and that is the sole question before the Senate. The House propose to take from the Government of the United States the power to terminate this contract upon six months' notice. Is it to the advantage of the Government to take away that power? Is there a man here who has given any reason to show that it would be to the advantage of the Government? It may be to the advantage of the company. Senators talk about the obstruction to the public business! What has obstructed it but the rapacious demands of this company? What does the Government get by it? Can you answer that question unless you go outside of the facts of the case, leave the real question, and make imaginary reasons as excuses for the Government? Is not the retention of this power an advantageous provision for the Government? Does any Senator deny it to be right that the power to terminate this contract, giving nearly $400,000 extra, should be held in the hands of the representatives of the people according to the stipulations of the contract? Is it not advantageous to the American Government? No man can deny that it is just. No man has pretended to deny it. Why shall we surrender it? I will inquire into the reasons that are given why we should give it up. Is it an extraordinary power?

Mr. BAYARD. Will the honorable Senator allow me to say that in this or any other matter, a provision which authorizes Congress to determine and put an end to a contract is unwise and objectionable.

Mr. TOOMBS. I can answer the Senator by showing him that the American people, and his predecessors for fifty years, have differed from him. You have not a contract for the carrying of a horse mail in America that has not the stipulation in it reserving the right to put an end to it. That is the idea of the Senator from Delaware! Sir, I repeat, every contract made by the Post Office Department for a steamboat mail, a horse mail, a coach mail—every contract for carrying the mail by the authority of this Government—has this precise stipulation in it.

Mr. BAYARD. The honorable Senator takes only a part of my language. I spoke of Congress. I said Congress should have no such right under a contract. I say there are evils to flow from it.

Mr. TOOMBS. No doubt of it, sir; but I will not surrender a great Government right.

Mr. MASON. If the honorable Senator from Georgia will allow me, I understand the Senator from Delaware to say that it is unwise for Congress to have the power to terminate a contract, although it may be wise that the Executive should have it. The difference is this: Here Congress made a contract, which it ought never to have made, in my opinion, and there is a power reserved to terminate it.

Mr. BAYARD. My meaning is distinct. I think that, from the character of the body, such a discretionary power ought never to have been reserved to Congress. I think it is a dangerous power. I may be mistaken about it; but my impression is that it is a novel case certainly, in which a discretion of that kind remained in Congress to be performed by legislation. The principle of the post office laws is altogether different.

Mr. TOOMBS. If it would be worth while for the Senator, and he would take the trouble to look into my course on this question, he would find that no gentleman believed more thoroughly in his doctrine, and pursued that course more earnestly, than I have done. When this contract was made, I urged it, on the floor of the other branch of the Legislature, as a reason for not making it. I have stood by it for ten years, because Congress was an improper party to make the contract. You are giving me an additional reason for it to-day; and when you seek to take away what is a very wise provision for the country, though it may be an unwise one for the contractors, I resist it. I endeavor to confine the Government of the United States to two objects—to protect persons and property—and nothing else. It is not its business to enable any man to make a dollar.

But these people came here with fair promises. They said, we will carry the mail, twenty trips a year, for $385,000. They came with all sorts of false pretexts, and with all sorts of fallacious arguments to the Senate and House of Representatives. Look through the debates. Here they stand, every one proved to be utterly false from the history of the transaction. They came to us again two years after the contract was signed, and said, we have no money to build these ships; who shall build them? The Government must build them or the whole thing will break down. So we paid them $385,000, as you have heard—$25,000 a month—until they could build them. That is, they are built with our money. They agreed to build five, but they have never done it to this day. They built four, and lost one of them; and now you are paying them for replacing the lost ship. They are bound to build two. This shows that Congress is an unfit body to make a contract for other people; I do not say for themselves; but as a political body, I have always believed it to be unfit; and this satisfies me of it. I do not expect that any member of this body, or of the other House, would make a contract that would give away all the beneficial terms of it to the other transacting party and place himself completely in his power; and why should we do it as a legislative body? Why should you take away this control, which, as I have stated, is in every contract which is made in the Post Office Department. If you want a horse mail to be taken through the prairies of the West or the swamps of the South, a part of the contract which is made for it, is that, if you want to put an end to the service, because it is not advantageous to the public, if you want to put on another mail, or if you want to carry it another way, or if somebody will do it cheaper, it may be done. Universally in all the contracts, there is such a stipulation—I do not say who makes it. The Senator from Delaware does not seem to object to the right to make the stipulation; but as to who shall exercise it. The officers of the Government say to the contractors we will terminate it whenever we please, giving you the stipulated damages. What are they? Thirty days pay. That is the law of the United States. You find that stipulation in all the contracts made by the Government, so far as the Post Office Department is concerned.

Then why should this power be taken away in this case? Gentlemen say that Congress is troubled by this subject. The honorable Senator from Michigan [Mr. STUART] attempted to give two reasons for maintaining this contract and for repealing the power which one of the contracting parties reserved, at the time, over the contract. What were they? Why, first, he says, this Collins line of steamers controls the great body of the legislation of the country. If it does, is it not disgraceful to maintain it for an hour? If that is true, I care not what may be its advantages, though it is to beat the British, though it is to build up a marine. I say abrogate the contract. No matter what may be its advantages, if the reason given by the Senator from Michigan be true, that so transcendent is the power of this company in the Congress of the United States, that whenever it comes up here it pursues a system of log-rolling and affects the great body of the legislation of this country, if it be true, Senators, why not abrogate it down to the bottom and pay damages? I would pay ten millions to-night rather than have the Government of this great country interrupted by so infamous a thing.

Mr. STUART. I only wish to remark to the Senator, that he entirely misapprehends me; but I do not desire to interrupt his speech.

Mr. TOOMBS. I certainly understood the Senator to assign it as a reason why we should repeal this power to give the notice, that it comes here and interferes with other legislation; that it becomes so connected with other subjects as to control our legislation.

Mr. STUART. I did not state that it controlled the legislation of Congress.

Mr. TOOMBS. Well, that it affects it. Give your own language.

Mr. STUART. The Senator may, for the purposes of his argument, draw his inferences. To that I do not object; but he should not say that I stated that——

Mr. TOOMBS. I ask the Senator to state his own language, and I will accept it.

Mr. STUART. I stated that the power could not be exercised by Congress arbitrarily; and I gave my reasons for it—that the interests of the country were involved, and, therefore, it could not be done. I stated, also, that its effect upon the legislation of the country was bad, because it soon became a controversy in Congress, and affected every other question of importance.

Mr. TOOMBS. I accept it as the gentleman explains it. Here then is a contract to carry the mail from New York to Liverpool which affects every question of legislation before the American Congress. The question of whether we shall pay these people $858,000 a year affects the entire legislation of this great Republic! I know of no reason so great, so grand, that ought to be so controlling to every Senator who hears my voice to-night. If the Senator's speculations are correct, tear the contract from your statute-books, pile money upon these creatures until they are gorged—and that would be heavy and a difficult business—give them what they want, but take from the Halls of Congress that question which is controlling the great interests of twenty millions of freemen. Sir, I believe it has affected legislation to some extent; but I hope not to the extent that the Senator from Michigan supposes it has. Why should this be done? Have we not got other contracts? We have one for the carrying of the mail to Chagres. We have one for carrying it from Panama to Oregon. Large sums of money are paid for them. We have the Aspinwall line from Panama to Oregon with precisely the same provision in regard to increased pay. Why does not somebody come here and say tear out of the statute-book the power which we have over that? Why is the Collins line selected, why is the proposition made to repeal that power in regard to it alone? We have, I say, a similar contract with other lines, given for precisely the same reason, but I have heard no member of the Senate, or House of Representatives, say repeal that power. We had the mail carried once a month, we wanted it once a fortnight, and we gave Mr. Aspinwall and those contractors an increased compensation, with this precise provision that we could take it off whenever we chose. Nobody speaks of repealing that; but we are asked to do it for the Collins line; and why? They must come here to disturb Congress. Yes, sir, they have disturbed it. The very suspicion that they have enabled the malignant and the unworthy to cast upon reputations, good or bad, is more damage to this Republic than the value of forty ships. I make no charge about it, for I know nothing about it; but I say the very suspicion which they have cast upon the legislation of this country, is enough for a man who desires to preserve the Government of the country not only pure but unsuspected. That honorable gentlemen have to put their hands into a business from which they, and their legislation receive a taint—a taint, sir, whether true or false—is dishonorable. Let us free ourselves from this. What is easier? Where are the great questions which demand that it should not be done? Does it concern the security of the Republic? Is the empire in danger if three ships of the line are discontinued? I would vote to abrogate these contracts, pay damages, and take the ships. I would do that, or if that cannot succeed, I would next do as I did last session, vote to give the notice to terminate the extra allowance of four or five hundred thousand dollars a year. Let them surrender their contract. I would open a competition with the Post Office Department for the transmission of the mail on that line as on all other routes.

But, the Senator from Michigan says, the great commercial classes are not going to be contented, unless they can get a certain amount of speed. I apprehend that if the commercial classes of the country want speed they ought to pay for it. I think that is sound reason. Sir, has the Senator a right to tax the wheat grower, the corn grower, the industrious classes of Michigan, in order that the merchants of New York, or Charleston, or Savannah, may get their foreign letters quicker? I say that the great difficulty in your legislation, in departing from wise principles, is, that you, through the act of the owners of newspapers, the enterprising, the bad of society, are endeavoring to throw the great burdens of Government upon the honest, the laborious, the unsuspecting; and it is being done every day. Let me go to the Post Office Department to apply for a mail down in my State; perhaps we want an increase of two or three times a week; it will probably cost very little additional; and what chance of success do I stand? The office will look into the business; and I shall be told "it does not pay a stipulated proportion of the expense, and you cannot get it." But here, the Collins line with all the figuring you can make out of it, yields us no proportion of the thousands and hundreds of thousands of dollars which we give for it; and I am told that the commercial classes demand expedition, and, therefore, we must submit to that. I know the idea is thrown out to us—and the Senator from Michigan says—that it will finally get back to us. That has been the argument of all the protected classes, of all the privileged classes, of all the monopolists, of all the knaves that ever plundered honest people. The merchants will tell you that if you make the commerce bear this burden, it will be thrown upon the people. Let it go there. They know it is not true, or they would not come here to seek it. They do not come here for our sakes, but for their own, and we understand this. It is a very true general principle of political economy that business must pay its expenses, but they are continually contriving to make the classes that ought not to pay, pay the expenses of their business. The people of the country will understand this. They will not be satisfied with the mere words of Democracy upon men's lips. They want to see its principles shown in acts. They want equality of rights under this Government; and the farmer of Michigan, as much as the farmer of Iowa, or of Florida, has a right to demand that, if the commercial classes of the country want monopolies or increased advantages, the money shall come out of their own pockets. These pretenses, these sophistries, these lame figures to get rid of official facts cannot satisfy them. Your object is to put upon the industry of the country, the expenses of carrying on a great and profitable commercial business. I am opposed to it.

Sir, how did the Government get along for forty years before it entered into this arrangement? My friend from North Carolina has made a very beautiful speech. I listened to catch its rounded periods; but it contained but one single idea, and that was that he wanted to beat the British. Well, sir, I have had some of those feelings myself. But let us look at this upon principles of political economy. England gets twice as many mails as we do for less money. She gets a weekly mail for less than $800,000 per annum; we pay $850,000 per annum for one every two weeks. Now how is that to be explained? Men are not going to be humbugged by the reasons which are given for it. I have too great a respect for the human intellect to think so. They say we have great big ships, and the Senator from Delaware says they burn more coal. Why did they build such ships? I want the mail carried. I want the mail facilities; and if you build ships that cost you $20,000 to run them, when the work might have been done as well for $2,000, I certainly shall not be so stupid as to be imposed upon by your getting ships that cost so much more to run them because they burn more coal. But these ships were not built on that basis, I can tell the honorable Senator from Delaware. I know how this work was done. When the company had failed to comply with their contract; when they had built only four steamers instead of five, they came here and said let us off from that stipulation, because we have built them so much larger than the contract required. What advantage is that? What we wanted was to have the mail carried; and if a smaller vessel would answer, why build one twice as big? But, sir, the principle seems to have been that if they made mistakes we should pay for them.

That has been the history of the Collins line. All the mistakes, all the follies, all the extravagances Congress has paid for. All the expense comes out of the public Treasury. The contract never has been complied with up to this day. The Senator from Connecticut alluded to the Navy Department. I can tell my friend that I have looked into the reports of your naval officers, and they said that these ships were unfit for war purposes—that the Navy Department made these contracts with ships unfit for the purpose. I do not know whether it is so or not; but this shows you how much reliance is to be placed on your naval officers. The Secretary of the Navy refused to receive the vessels. He did not at first receive them. But Mr. Preston, the Secretary of the Navy under President Taylor, after refusing them, subsequently accepted them. I do not know why it was so. I do, however, know that he was at first denounced in the hireling organs of the Collins company—the New York Herald and other papers. That is the way these things were done. The officers of the Navy declared all along that the vessels were not fit for such purposes. The Secretary of the Navy told you all the time that they did not comply with the contract; that they were not fit for the service; but they have dragooned Secretaries, rode over officers, and somehow subdued Congress.

That is the fact about it; and there it stands. At the last Congress they came here and said we have a great race with the British, and asked for an increase of compensation. They appealed to our patriotism and prejudices against England. Nobody has a stronger prejudice against England than I have.

Mr. ADAMS. Except General CASS.

Mr. TOOMBS. No, not even General CASS, [laughter;] but I do not think I have ever declared war against her; if I had, I could have got the nation up to it. [Laughter.] Under all circumstances, and at all times, she has been the common robber of the human race, the enemy of all mankind, the execration of the world; but if I wish to show my hostility to her, and if I desire to set to work to break her down, is this the way to do it? If she chooses to bring my letters from Liverpool to New York for twelve and a half cents, while it costs her a dollar, my policy would be to let her do as much as she could do at it; it would not make me any poorer, and I am sure it would make her much poorer. Yes, sir, these people have appealed to national patriotism. In support of a flagitious scheme, without argument, without public principle, they have appealed to the grand, the sound, the patriotic, the national idea of hostility to England. If England will carry the letters, very well. If it costs us almost a million a year to do it, why should I contend for that business? No sane man would do it—I do not think any Senator would do it—in his private affairs; but they do it here because of public considerations—because the vessels will be of use to the Navy! If you want naval ships, get them. I have never withheld my hand from the Navy. I voted for additional ships last year. If you want a hundred naval ships now for the service, I will vote them as fast as I can go for them. But build good ships. Do not build such miserable things as these vessels, and tell us "these are for our use." They do not suit us. We never expect to get them. I do not wish to go into a controversy with my friends from North Carolina and Texas. I admit that, in the case of a war ship, the faster you can make it the better; but the question has always been, whether or not speed is compatible with the other requisites. I have not looked into it. I care nothing about it; for it does not come up here. If you want ships, buy them, if that is the way to get them. If you want any more, build them or buy them. Hire Mr. Collins's naval constructor, if he is the best in the United States. If he builds better than anybody else for the same money, you ought to employ him—he is deserving of employment. That would be a fair business transaction. But now, under the pretense that you want ships, you are giving him a job for which the nation pays. Everybody knows that. It is intended for nothing else than a job. We cannot deceive the country in this matter. I do not impugn the opinions of a single member of the Senate; for I know many gentleman are controlled by the idea that the vessels will beat the British, and thereby get national glory. Well, I think it a small affair; and, at all events, we have run the race; why run it over again? You have been two or three years at this; and now we find that other persons have agreed to do the service for less.

I concur in the remarks of my friend upon the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, [Mr. RUSK,] that we are greatly indebted to our commercial marine, and it being an arm of our national defense, we ought to do everything that we can legitimately do, to encourage it. But do you encourage it by a monopoly? Does my honorable friend from Texas believe that the way to build up good steamships is to say, by your legislation in giving over $800,000 to one company, that nobody in the world but that one company shall run from New York to Liverpool, and another from New York to Chagres, another to San Francisco, &c.? Is that the way to produce a rivalry? Is that the way to build up a commercial marine—a steam marine? That is not the idea of any portion of this Republic.

My friend from Texas alluded to the navigation laws. Every abuse is the natural ally of every other abuse. He appealed to navigation laws standing on the statute-books (which, I doubt not, will be condemned the moment public opinion can be brought to bear upon them) in order to justify a monopoly in these steamships; but those laws encouraged the skill of different persons. I need not go into a consideration of them now. They encouraged a domestic competition which has invigorated the rivalry and ingenuity of our hardy men, and made us so successful in building up sailing vessels which compete with all the nations of the world; but if Congress had been so unwise as to enact that one ship only should run out of Savannah, another run out of some port in Maine, some other from New York, do you believe that our people would have attained their present proud preëminence and proud skill in building ships? Everybody knows they would not. Then, I say, bad as the navigation laws are, they have given free competition among Americans; and to that extent the amount of evil which they were likely to inflict upon the Republic was greatly meliorated.

Then, what weight have the rest of the arguments used in support of this contract? None. My friend from Michigan [Mr. STUART] attempts to figure up that these people make about as much money by postages as we pay out. Mr. President, there is one thing very certain about it. I have relied, as matters of fact, upon the statements of the Postmaster General; and I have a right to rely upon them, for the reason that, if he ever got more money than he says he has got, he has never accounted for it. That is all we can know. We take his official account. He receives so much money; that is in the Treasury. My friend from Michigan must find his money and put it into the Treasury, so that we can take it into account. We are expending here two or three millions of dollars. Why? Why, as the Senator says, because the community will not tolerate anything but the most expeditious mail. If society wants speed let society pay for speed; let those who are benefited by it meet the expense; let those who receive the benefits support the burdens. That was the basis of the Post Office Department in the better days of the Republic, when we had Republicans, not bastard dissemblers, who call themselves Democrats. In those days, when we had Republicans in this Government, the principle was acted on to make the Post Office Department sustain itself. Now, two or three millions must be voted from the Treasury because the commercial classes want speed! The people along the line of a mail will clamor for increased facilities; of course they will clamor just in proportion as they are seeking injustice, and they must get what they clamor for at the expense of the Treasury!

Then we are brought to the question of whether the Collins line is a good line? Whether the contract is a good contract? Whether the considerations are wise considerations? Do the gentlemen offer a single reason, except that it interferes with the public business for putting this power to give the notice out of the hands of the contracting party—the Government? I have not heard one. The reasons which are given are none at all. But they say it comes here and disturbs the Senate and takes up time. Very well; if gentlemen want claims, all that they have to do, on this principle, is to come here, raise a muss, raise a difficulty, or get up an exciting question, or get some members in this body—it would not take more than two or three—to speak to the end of the session, and give as a reason for any policy, that they are troublesome. They will cease to be troublesome when Congress demands a compliance with their contract. They will cease to be troublesome when Congress punishes them for its violation, as becomes the representatives of a great people. Punish them for it; abolish their contracts; take their ships and pay for them; you have a right to do that. If they are troublesome, and interfere with legislation—if they disturb the other great business of the country, in the name of God value their ships, pay for them, and put them in the Navy or burn them up. You may take them and make a funeral fire of them upon the ocean; you may scatter their ashes to the four winds; you may bring fire from Heaven and consume them for thus disturbing us, and forwarding this miserable legislation; but do something to preserve the purity of legislation.

Who comes here? Who demanded $25,000 for one of the ships? Who came here when they wanted $425,000, and on each occasion, exclaimed, "Help me, Cassius, or I sink?" Congress? Did Congress ever go after them? Have we called upon them to come forward here? Has Congress come forward here with this movement? Gentlemen say that the Collins people did not offer for the contract. I do not know how that is; but about the time we offered to hire somebody to do the job, they came here and asked for it. That is all I know about it, and it is all that is necessary to be known about it. Who comes here now? Is it the interest of the Government? Are not the friends of the enterprise in favor of the application? Is it true, that the public men of the Senate and House of Representatives of this country are coming here for the purpose of relieving the Collins company from an onerous condition? If they are, they are rather the representatives of Collins than of the United States of America. I say if a member of the Senate or House of Representatives is coming here to get rid of this condition, he is rather a representative of the company than the country. I do not think that all this excitemant, which is spoken of, all this trouble would be given to the Senate and House of Representatives, if Collins & Co. had no interest in this, and did not want it.

The motion of the Committee on Finance is a moderate one. The amendment indicated by the Senator from Tennessee is a just one. I am in favor of it. I shall maintain it; and if I thought I could meet with the concurrence of my fellow members of this body, if I could satisfy them as well as my own mind is satisfied, of the injustice of this, I would submit one myself, to take these ships for the Government service, abolish the contracts, and throw open this service to England, with postal treaties—throw it open to competition, and competition precisely on the same condition as other mail contracts of the United States are made. That would be the best plan to pursue. My friend from Tennessee has shown that you could make money by it, and it is wise and politic that you should do so. They are not the only people who are building ships. The Collins line, so far as speed is concerned, have done well. Some gentlemen say that Mr. Vanderbilt, whom I do not know, has proposed to do the same for less money, but not as fast, and that is the object. We have never contracted that the mail should be carried in eight, or ten, or twelve days; that is not "nominated in the bond." Sometimes it goes better than others; sometimes it goes in twelve days, and sometimes in ten; but I have never understood that any fault was found with the line, if a vessel was out fourteen or seventeen days. I have not gone into a calculation; but I think very likely that if the Post Office Department in that, as in all other contracts—taking in view all the casualties and difficulties—had advertised for the performance of the service in the time that the Collins line perform it, it could have been obtained at a less sum than is paid to them, and at a sum which would pay a reasonable profit to the contractors.

Therefore, I say, Mr. President, that I have heard no good reason given why we should part with the power which we now have of terminating the contract. What is it? Why, that Congress may hereafter refuse this condition of the contract; and, now, when one third of this body are about to return to their constituents, and when this House of Representatives is to be succeeded by another House, why do they, at this late hour of the session, desire to take from their successors that just control, which has been secured by their predecessors, over this contract, to which the country is entitled? I know of no good reason, and cannot vote for it.

Mr. STUART. There are two or three points in which I desire to correct the honorable Senator from Georgia. I do not wish to follow him in the line of his argument; but, sir, in the first place, he is mistaken in supposing that he is correct when he says that this line has come here again. Sir, the Postmaster General, in his annual report, recommended Congress to give the notice. It was a recommendation which he gave no reason for making, except that he thought the price paid to the line was too large. Congress some two years ago passed upon that question and decided upon it. The Postmaster General having made that recommendation, the company were bound to come here, and resist the plain violation of an agreement into which they had entered with the Government.

Again, sir, the Senator says that he is obliged to take the statements of this Postmaster General as true, because he says if they are not true, he has got the money, and does not show what he has done with it. Now, sir, that is another mistake. The difficulty is that the Postmaster General does not credit his income to the persons who earn it.

Mr. TOOMBS. Then he does not understand his business.

Mr. STUART. I say he does not credit what he receives from Boston, Philadelphia, and California to the company that earns it. It goes into the Treasury; it passes to the credit of "amount received from Philadelphia," "amount received from Boston,"&c.; but by not giving the credit to the Collins line, for the amount received from it, he does not show where it came from. Sir, there is no money stolen from the Treasury as the Senator fain would have us believe.

Mr. TOOMBS. Not at all.

Mr. STUART. The whole difficulty is that he does not credit the sources that earned it. The Senator says, again, that this bill is taking from the power of Congress the right to terminate this contract. Not at all, sir. Congress possesses the power under the contract to terminate it at any moment, and take the ships and pay for them, and no less will they have that power by refusing to adopt the amendment. It simply affects the extra compensation, and nothing else.

The Senator says, again, that he would have the persons pay for the mail service who receive its benefits. That is one of the theories which are very beautiful in the abstract, but utterly impracticable to be carried out. It is one of the theories that would cut off several States of this Union from the benefits of the mail service, because in looking over the returns you will find several States that do not pay as much in the way of postages as is paid for their service. But, sir, they are just as much entitled to the mail service as the rest. I say it is a theory which would be very fine if you could carry it out, but it is utterly impracticable.

The Senator was set right by me—and it was the only interruption that I felt myself at liberty to make, for I dislike to make any—with respect to what I said before. I deny, sir, having said that these persons come here voluntarily and interfere with the legislation of Congress; but they are brought here by the improper action of the officers of this Government. Here is one thing which has been done of late which was never done before. The appropriations are put into a separate bill. You appropriate for the rest of the Post Office affairs of the country in the General Post Office appropriation bill; but for this, and similar lines, in order that they may be constantly under the threatening attitude of some of the officers of this Government, or some one of the committees of Congress, you make a separate bill, and you give notice that you are going to fight them, you have been fighting them, because you can lose that bill and not stop the wheels of the Government. The whole plan has been carried out most ingeniously by the Government, either through committees of Congress, or through officers of the Government. Put these appropriations into the general appropriation bill, where they belong, and you will not find this company threatened every year with annihilation.

Thus much I have thought it due, eminently due, in justification of these men, to say; and that is all I care about it. If Congress sees fit to terminate the contract, to carry out the ideas of the Senator from Georgia, to take the ships, to blot out the line, I, sir, will submit without a single regret. I can bear that loss as well as the Senator himself or anybody else can bear it. I shall vote against it, believing it to be against the fundamental interests of this Government. Sir, the history of this transaction will show that these individuals have been compelled to come here, and resist this oppression, this violation of what was a plain understanding; that is to say, so long as you perform the twenty-six trips in a manner satisfactory to the Government and the community, the question of your compensation is settled. The Postmaster General says, in substance, "they have performed their duty; they are the only company that have done it; and yet I recommend Congress to give notice to terminate the extra compensation, because I think it is too much." I say Congress settled that question when they granted the compensation.

Mr. HUNTER. I am not disposed to speak on this subject, for I am very anxious to have the question taken; but it is an entire mistake to say that Congress intended, when it gave the additional compensation, that the company should have it so long as they performed their duties. Not at all. It was said that they were not making enough to enable them to compete with the Cunard line; it was proposed to give the additional allowance to enable them to do so, and it was expressly provided that the additional allowance should last two years, and after that that Congress might put an end to it. What was to be the reason for putting an end to it? The moment they found they could carry on the business without the additional allowance, there being no further necessity for it, they might put an end to it.

Mr. RUSK. I desire to put a question to the honorable Senator from Virginia. I desire to ask him if Congress did not try to set aside this allowance before the two years were out?

Mr. HUNTER. Congress did not offer to give the notice until at that time when the notice might have been given, in my opinion, according to the law, because, sir, the six months notice which was required, if given at the time it was proposed to have been given, would have been after the two years had elapsed, so that they did not violate the contract in that regard. At any rate it was not given; this bill of the last session was defeated, and defeated by a friend of the line, who spoke against time, as is well known.

Mr. RUSK. That was before the two years expired.

Mr. HUNTER. No, sir; that was before the two years expired, but the notice might have been given within the two years, provided the compensation did not terminate until after the two years, and no one contemplated terminating the extra compensation, until after two years. Be that as it may, the notice was not given, and the two years have now elapsed. I say it would be no violation of the contract even although the Collins line kept the time prescribed, if we were now to refuse to give the extra allowance. They are on a much better footing than they were. They have enjoyed its privilege for a long time—for more than two years. But on the other hand, the great rivals of the company are withdrawn; the British have required the Cunard steamers in the east, and while the Collins line have not a heavy competition, it is proposed to keep up the entire allowance. Surely it would be no violation of the contract to terminate it. But that is not even proposed. All that is asked is, that we retain in our hands the power to give the notice. Suppose the Cunarders should be withdrawn entirely; suppose the Collins line should not have the competition; the only excuse upon which the extra was ever given, was to enable them to compete with that company; and yet you propose to take away from Congress the power to give notice, and put an end to the allowance, at the very time that the compensation is being diminished, when everything shows that it cannot long be formidable.

Mr. SEWARD. The Senate has been several times to-day reminded that at the last session of Congress I committed what seemed to be if not an abuse, at least an impropriety, not in saying too much, but talking too long, in favor of the Collins line of steamers. I plead, in extenuation of that course, that the Senate, in the night before the adjournment, after a long debate, had sustained the views which I then entertained, and which I now entertain; and that the next day, just before the final close of the session, when Senators were impatient to leave, and were leaving rapidly, it became doubtful whether the Senate, as it remained constituted, would not renounce those views. Therefore I deemed it necessary to guard against what would have been a surprise upon the majority of the Senate, who had voted in accordance with those views on the night before. I hope it is now a sufficient vindication of that action on my part, that the Senate itself, when it came together this session, confirmed those same views, and that the House of Representatives also, when it assembled this session, reconsidered its own position, and adopted that to which I had labored so earnestly to bring the Senate. Having excused that impropriety, I will not now commit another abuse by speaking long upon this subject. I have sent for an honorable and distinguished Senator, of advanced age, who, I hope, will be here in a few moments, [Mr. CASS.] I rise merely to fill up a gap of time; and I know that such is the respect for that Senator entertained here that I shall be excused for this intrusion.

The Senator from Georgia [Mr. TOOMBS] has certainly convinced me, and no doubt every one else, that he is most sincere and in earnest in opposing this measure; but I think if he would review his own positions, he would not be satisfied with them, after he should have discovered how broad and how foreign is the ground that he has occupied.

Sir, I think the honorable Senator from Connecticut stated this case with admirable precision and accuracy. It is just exactly this: Here is a contract on which the Government owes $858,000, and here is an annual appropriation bill, in which it is proposed to appropriate money to pay that sum of $858,000. No one here disputes that debt; no one here proposes that we shall withhold the money for any cause whatever; no one proposes that we shall pay a cent less than the $858,000. So far we are all agreed. It is money that is due by contract, and the contract itself can not now be wisely, justly, or properly reviewed. So the money is due. What remains? Why, in making the appropriation to pay that sum, the House of Representatives—which originates bills of this kind, which originated the bills at the last session, at this session, and must originate them at every session—has come to the conviction that it would be wise and just to repeal a clause in the law under which that contract was made, which authorized Congress to give notice, at its discretion, after the period of two years, of a purpose to discontinue the contract. That is all. The House propose that we shall repeal that clause; the question is, whether we shall or not. That is the whole question. Of all which has been said beyond that, I have only to say, that it is foreign from the question.

What reasons are given why we should repeal this clause? One alone of those reasons is sufficient to satisfy my mind, namely: that on an appropriation bill in the last week of the session, in the last hours of the fifth day from the close of the session, it is never wise unnecessarily to raise a conflict with the House of Representatives, because, in the first place, you jeopard the passage of a great bill; and in the next place, you jeopard the passage of a great many other great and necessary bills. Accordingly, we are habitually accustomed to waive additions, stipulations, and provisions which we should otherwise prefer, in order to secure agreement with the House of Representatives, and to bring the business of the Government to a successful and happy termination. All the hazards which can attend any bill will attend this, if returned to the House of Representatives; for whatever difference of opinion there is here, the same difference of opinion, we know, would exist there, and would engage that House in long, strenuous, and earnest debate; whatever of feeling or of prejudice; whatever of passion or of interest, attaches to this question here, would attend the bill if we send it back there, and it would be jeoparded, and might be lost. What are the consequences of that? The second time the faith of the Government is broken, and $858,000 due to citizens for services actually rendered under a contract, is withheld—is not paid. That is bad enough; but besides that, come all the entangling consequences to other business.

To these considerations, what is the reply? It is that we have this power, and we please to keep it. It gratifies us to say that we will not relinquish the power of giving this notice. Why shall we not? If we are wise men, we will retain it, only because it is valuable for something; and if we are wise men, we shall give it up if it is not valuable. Now, what is it worth? Do we wish to give the notice now? There is only one honorable Senator who proposes to give that notice by virtue of the reservation contained in the contract. The whole Senate, comparatively, like the whole House, are ready to pay the money already accrued, without giving the notice. The contract has been in force for two years, and the legislation during that time has shown that it was not necessary or proper to give the notice heretofore. Then no cause has existed heretofore, and none at present exists, for giving this notice. Do you anticipate a state of things, when you will be required to give it? Are circumstances changed—changed favorably for the contractors and unfavorably for the Government? No, sir; the mails are carried with the stipulated expedition; the pride and honor of the country are sustained; its service is completely performed, just as it was required to be; the Government has no cause of complaint, and anticipates none.

On the other hand the parties to whom it is contemplated that the notice may, in some circumstances, be given, have been unfortunate—unfortunate by a calamity that has touched the chords of the public heart most deeply, and which has so powerfully affected the mind of every individual in the country that it is painful to speak of it, even in the most public manner on so great an occasion as this. One of those ships, freighted with the lives of our fellow-citizens, has gone down into the depths of the sea. You have a bond that it shall be replaced; you wish the place of the ship supplied as it ought to be, and you expect that it will be supplied under the contract. The contractor says, If I must supply the place of this ship, for the short period which remains of the contract, will you not release me from the condition which authorizes you arbitrarily to give notice that you will discontinue the contract? It seems to me a fair appeal. Upon what grounds is it presented and sustained? Sir, it is sustained, and well sustained, upon this ground; that notwithstanding all the figures that have been arrayed here, this has been to the contractors an unprofitable contract, it is still an unprofitable contract. Their money has not been wasted, but it has been spent with energy and fidelity, with zeal and self-sacrificing liberality in carrying out their contract with the Government. Although this is true, it is nevertheless the fact that their stock is not now worth, never has been worth the par price, and, if their contract continues there is no probability it will ever be worth more than sixty or seventy cents on the dollar.

The company who are to build another of these great steamships must do it with capital and with credit, either their own, or derived from some other source. Capitalists will not furnish the money to execute a contract which is in perpetual jeopardy of being canceled by legislative authority. This, sir, is a just consideration. It is one which ought to prevail, and must prevail, against a mere speculative advantage of having power to annul a contract—a power which you expect never to have occasion to exercise.

Other considerations, I know, have been adduced here in regard to the unpleasant circumstances which attend the advocacy of this bill and its discussion here. It is said that it brings what is called a suspicion and a taint upon the purity of Congress. Sir, it is our misfortune that we make an unnecessary stipulation, and reserve in our hands a power, in consequence of which every opponent of this scheme about the purlieus of the Capitol, in the city of New York, through the whole Union, all competitors, all enemies, all haters of Collins and his prosperity, will come here and combine together to urge Congress to discontinue the contract that their own private ends may be attained. Such as this is the spectacle which we see before us. Here are your Vanderbilts and others, rivals or enemies of the Collins line, who are pressing upon Congress to exercise this power of annulling the contract, in order that they may have the benefit of it; and when the proprietors of the line come forward in great alarm and peril to defend their rights, they are told that their solicitations impair the dignity and taint the atmosphere of Congress!

Let us put an end, then, to these things, by giving up a control which is useless to us, which is injurious to the enterprise itself; and my word for it, you will never more hear one whisper of complaint throughout the land about the Collins line.

Sir, I remember the history of this case when it was here before. I remember that the same threats and intimidations were offered, the same apprehensions and alarms were excited, and the same suspicions were shown everywhere in the public mind; and members of Congress were afraid to vote the allowance which they believed to be just, because they thought the public would not comprehend the importance of the line; but the law passed, and for a time there was peace. Until the close of the last session of Congress, there was one universal acclaim of joy, satisfaction, and gratitude throughout the country, for the public spirit with which Congress had sustained this great national enterprise. Prejudice is raised against this line on the ground of Mr. Vanderbilt's offer. Sir, Congress required ships of a certain size and magnitude, combining elegance, solidity, durability, and swiftness, and Collins furnished them. They obtained by this contract just what was required. The contractors have given just what was proposed, and even more. Now Vanderbilt comes and says, "dispense with some of these requirements, and I will carry your mails by furnishing you with ships of my own on cheaper terms." Could you accept that proposition of Vanderbilt justly, without, at the same time, taking the Collins steamers and paying for them? and if you do that, I wish to know what you will make by discontinuing your contract with Collins, and entering into a new contract with Vanderbilt.

Again, it is said by some Senators, that this is an extravagant, a luxurious line. Sir, this line of steamers is, in my judgment, the proper diplomatic representative of the United States to the Old World. Who is there here that hesitated last Saturday to give a salary of $17,000 a year to the Minister at the Court of St. James—a salary with which he might maintain himself in a style worthy of the representative of this great Republic? Who is there that refused to give a salary of $15,000 to the American Minister sent to France, and of $12,000 to the Minister to Spain? Who is there that denies the justice of the appeal, that he who represents his country abroad, in its diplomacy, shall maintain the dignity of his country there? But, sir, this line of ships—the strongest in the world, and the swiftest in the world—this diplomatic messenger traversing the ocean both ways, exchanges the salutations and the greetings of men and of nations in both hemispheres, while it opens the way for the establishment of mutual commerce between the ports of our own land and all the ports of the European continent. It is the pride of my heart that I can see that line sustained in its strength, its power, its elegance, its majesty. Sir, would you tell me that that proud position which you occupy would be just as dignified, and that you could perform your duties just as well if I should strip away all that drapery from above your head? Would you say that the Senate of the United States would lose nothing in dignity if I should strike down at a blow that beautiful collonade, and bring down that noble dome to the level of the ceilings of barracks in a military station? Would you say that was an economy in Government necessary to be practised by a great people?

Sir, the Collins line is the great mail carrier between Europe and America. I shall sustain it cheerfully now, and always, with every contribution which is necessary, and I shall endeavor to extend similar lines of communication across the Pacific, until we shall have encircled the world with the couriers of intelligence, and the instructions of civil and religious liberty.

I have one additional observation, and then I shall close. We are told that this is a monopoly, and that it is no way to encourage a steam marine by creating a monopoly. Sir, it is the way, and the only way, in which you can bring a steam marine into existence. It is thirty years since Dr. Lardner predicted that steam would never be a self-sustaining agent upon the ocean. When the first steamer crossed from Bristol to New York, the world derided the short-sightedness of the great philosopher. But, sir, what is the fact? Thirty years have elapsed, and, although steam is so necessary and useful an agent, it is not yet self-sustaining as a navigating power across the Atlantic, nor across any other ocean; and you have your choice either by the Government to aid and sustain steam lines, or to do without them altogether. It is true, the time will come when it will not be necessary to render this aid; but until that time shall come it is most wise, and just, and prudent to sustain it in this way. Honorable Senators tell us, if you will withdraw Government patronage you will have enough competitors. Sir, has not Government effectually withdrawn its patronage from railroads and left private individuals to build them? Yet what have you seen? There has never been built in the United States, nor in England, nor in France, nor in Germany, although the railroad discovery is forty years old, a railroad that was not built by a monopolizing railroad company, aided sometimes, and in this country often, by the money of Government. The Erie canal, the most successful work of internal improvement ever made, was not built by a private company, nor by a company with its own money. On the contrary, it may be doubted whether it would ever yet have been built had it not been adopted by New York, and constructed as a great national work.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. FITZPATRICK in the chair.) The question is on the amendment of the Committee on Finance.

Mr. GWIN stated that Mr. WELLER had paired off with Mr. JONES, of Tennessee.

Mr. BAYARD stated that he had paired off with Mr. SLIDELL.

Mr. DAWSON stated that Mr. BELL had paired off with Mr. JOHNSON.

Mr. EVANS stated that he had paired off with Mr. CLAYTON.

Mr. DODGE, of Wisconsin, stated that he had paired off with Mr. HAMLIN.

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Brodhead, Butler, Chase, Dawson, Fessenden, Fitzpatrick, Geyer, Hunter, Mallory, Mason, Morton, Pratt, Toombs, Toucey, Wade, and Wells—17.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Badger, Benjamin, Brainerd, Cooper, Douglas, Foot, Gillette, Gwin, James, Pettit, Rusk, Seward, Shields, Stuart, Sumner, Thomson of New Jersey, Walker, and Wright—19.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

The PRESIDENT. The next amendment reported from the Committee on Finance is to amend the clause "for transportation of the mails across the Isthmus of Panama, $85,314," by striking out "$85,314" and inserting "$120,000."

Mr. HUNTER. That is according to estimate.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. HUNTER. There are two other amendments which are necessary, and which I will explain. The bill contains a clause for transportation of the mails from New York to New Orleans, Charleston, Savannah, Havana, and Chagres, and back, $261,000. The House deducted the ten per centum in appropriating the amount. They have not appropriated enough; it ought to be $290,000. I move an amendment accordingly.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. HUNTER. I will merely state, in regard to that matter, that the amendment which I moved is necessary to make it accord with the estimate. The Senate may do as they please with it.

Mr. CHASE. I submit the following amendment to come in after the clause in regard to the Collins steamers:

And provided further, That the proprietors of said line of steamers shall consent to such modification of the existing contract as that the Postmaster General may advertise for, and accept, proposals for carrying the mails in suitable steamships of not less than two thousand tons burden, between the United States and Great Britain, from and after the 31st of December, 1857, when said contract shall cease to be obligatory; and the said Postmaster General, in case said modification shall be agreed to, shall advertise for such proposals, which shall be submitted to Congress at the next session.

Mr. DAWSON. If the Senator from Ohio will give way, I will make a motion to adjourn.

Several SENATORS. Oh, no.

Mr. DAWSON. The attendance in the Senate is very thin. Thirty-six Senators only voted upon the question on which the yeas and nays have been taken, and the amendment thrown out. We ought to have a fuller Senate to decide the question. I therefore move the postponement of its further consideration until twelve o'clock to-morrow, in order that we may have a full Senate, and that it may be decided upon a full vote. Every man knows that it is due to the country that that should be the case.

The PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Ohio yield the floor for that purpose?

Mr. CHASE. Yes, sir.

Mr. HUNTER. If we adjourn in this condition, the whole subject will be open to discussion to-morrow, and we shall spend another day upon it. We have the civil and diplomatic appropriation bill, the Navy appropriation bill, and the fortification bill all to come up within the last four days of the session. I hope we shall not adjourn.

The PRESIDENT. The question is on postponing the further consideration of the bill until twelve o'clock to-morrow, and making it the special order for that hour.

Mr. DAWSON called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

Mr. MASON. I wish to put a question to my colleague, the chairman of the Committee on Finance, to see if I understand correctly what he has proposed. I understood him to say that on one of these lines, but not the Collins line, from some cause there was appropriated by the House ten per cent. less than the estimate. I want to know from him whether that ten per cent. less than the estimate is necessary to be added to bring the price up to the contract.

Mr. HUNTER. That ten per cent. is necessary to be added to bring the price up to the contract price. It is also, perhaps, fair to state, in order that my colleague may understand it fully, that the ten per cent. on the appropriation has been reserved in the Treasury, in order to be forfeited in case of a non-observance of the contract, although it has been usual, heretofore, to appropriate the entire amount. The House, by some mistake, appropriated the entire amount in regard to the Collins line, but made a deduction of ten per cent. in regard to the other lines. I propose to restore that to the estimate.

Mr. MASON. Then the case appears to be this: that the Collins line has, by the House, been allowed the great advantage of having this notice to terminate the contract withdrawn from the contract, and to be no longer a part of it, but another line has not within ten per cent. of the amount of its contract price appropriated; and the Senate refuse now to add that ten per cent. I really think that in that state of things it is best for us to adopt the suggestion of the Senator from Georgia, and to adjourn until to-morrow morning, to see whether injustice will not be done by this proceeding.

Mr. DOUGLAS. From the statement made by the Senator from Virginia, the chairman of the Committee on Finance, I understand that the ten per cent. is to be reserved for the performance of the contract, but that it has been usual heretofore to appropriate it, and allow the Executive Department to reserve it. This time Congress reserves it, so that it makes no difference to the proprietors of the line whether it is appropriated or not. It can make no difference to the Treasury nor to anybody concerned. That being the case, why insist upon it?

Mr. HUNTER. Here, though, is an appropriation which the Senate refused to put in, that does make a difference.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I am talking about this.

Mr. HUNTER. The item of the appropriation for the transportation of the mails across the Isthmus of Panama, $85,314, should, according to the estimate, be $120,000. The Committee on Finance have moved to raise the appropriation to the estimate. That, too, the Senate refuses to do.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Was it a part of the contract to make the amount $120,000, or is it the estimate of the Department?

Mr. HUNTER. It was to meet the estimate of the Department.

Mr. DOUGLAS. But it is not necessary, according to the contract.

Mr. HUNTER. No, sir.

Mr. ADAMS. It is said by the Senator from Illinois that it is not necessary to add that ten per cent., so far as the line alluded to by him is concerned; but it is deemed by the Senate and House of Representatives to be necessary to add that very ten per cent. to the Collins line appropriation whenever it is concerned. Now, sir, I should like to know why the ten per cent. is added to the appropriation upon the Collins line and not upon the other lines?

Mr. BUTLER. If my friend will allow me, I will tell him. The reason is, that the Collins line, like Aaron's rod, swallows up all the others. [Laughter.]

The question being taken by yeas and nays on the motion to postpone, resulted—yeas 19, nays 21; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Brodhead, Butler, Chase, Cooper, Dawson, Evans, Fitzpatrick, Geyer, Mallory, Mason, Morton, Pratt, Shields, Sumner, Toombs, Toucey, Wells, and Wilson—19.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Badger, Bayard, Benjamin, Brainerd, Douglas, Fessenden, Foot, Gillette, Gwin, Hunter, James, Pearce, Pettit, Rusk, Seward, Stuart, Thomson of New Jersey, Wade, Walker, and Wright—21.

So the motion was not agreed to.

Mr. CHASE. I feel it to be my duty to state briefly the considerations which will control my vote. I have no feeling whatever against this line. On the contrary, I desire its prosperity; but, sir, I think that my first duty is to the State which I represent, and to the Government which I assist, in part, to administer.

In 1847, Mr. Collins and his associates came to Congress proposing to transport the mails of the United States from New York to Liverpool and return, for the sum of $385,000 per annum. That was the price. They proposed to transport those mails in five steamships. That was the mode. The steamships were to be constructed so as to be adapted for the purposes of war as well as of navigation. They were to make twenty trips in the course of the year. The service commenced in April or June, 1850. After it had continued two years, application was made to Congress for an increase of compensation, and Congress granted that increase, so as to make the total annual compensation $858,000, more than doubling the original amount; while, in the mean time, only four out of the five steamships had been constructed; and it is now said that the company has been released from the construction of the fifth vessel. It thus appears that for the original service, with the addition of only six trips per annum, with the reduction of one steamship, we have increased the compensation more than twice its original amount.

I remember well upon what arguments the increase was urged during the session of 1852. We were told, then, that the contract had been a losing one; that the company had not been able to complete their vessels and transport the mails for the sum stipulated; and it was said at the same time that, if the additional compensation was granted, in the course of time the company would be remunerated for its losses within the time which would elapse before Congress would have the power to give the notice—that is, before the 31st of December, 1854. Who moved the proviso, limiting that contract to the 31st of December, 1854? It was the honorable Senator from Texas, [Mr. RUSK,] who then, as now, was a decided advocate of this line. I say it was that honorable Senator who moved this very proviso, limiting the contract to the 31st of December, 1854.

Mr. MASON. If the honorable Senator from Ohio will permit me, I will move that the further consideration of the subject be postponed until to-morrow at twelve o'clock. I think, from some conversation with Senators who made a majority upon the late vote, that they are satisfied that it will be expedient to adjourn. With the consent of the Senator, I submit that motion, and on it I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and taken.

Pending the announcement of the result, Mr. WILSON said: When I voted on the proposition of the committee, I did so through a misapprehension. I voted "no;" I intended to vote "aye."

Mr. BRODHEAD. The Senator can move to reconsider the vote.

The PRESIDENT. Yes, sir; that is the only way to proceed.

Mr. MASON. I suppose the Senator can be allowed to change his vote by unanimous consent?

The PRESIDENT. No, sir; the rule is imperative on that point. The Senator can move a reconsideration of the vote.

The result of the vote on the motion to postpone was then announced—yeas 21, nays 18; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Allen, Benjamin, Bright, Brodhead, Chase, Cooper, Dawson, Fitzpatrick, Geyer, Hunter, Mallory, Mason, Morton, Pearce, Pratt, Shields, Sumner, Toombs, Toucey, and Wells—21.

NAYS—Messrs. Badger, Bayard, Brainerd, Douglas, Fessenden, Foot, Gillette, Gwin, James, Pettit, Rusk, Seward, Stuart, Thomson of New Jersey, Wade, Walker, Wilson, and Wright—18.

So the motion was agreed to.

Mr. STUART. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The PRESIDENT. The Senator from Massachusetts can now make his motion.

Mr. STUART. He can do that to-morrow just as well as to-night.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, February 28, 1855.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill; the pending question being on the amendment submitted by Mr CHASE, to add the following:

Provided further, That the proprietors of said line of steamers shall consent to such modification of the existing contract as that the Postmaster General may advertise and accept proposals for carrying the mails in suitable steamships of not less than two thousand tons burden between the United States and Great Britain, from and after the 31st of December, 1857, when said contract shall cease to be obligatory; and the said Postmaster General, in case said modification shall be agreed to, shall advertise for such proposals, which shall be submitted to Congress at the next session.

Mr. CHASE. When I gave way for the motion to postpone last night, I was endeavoring to explain the grounds which induced me to offer this amendment. I shall now conclude, very briefly, what I have to say.

One of the arguments which was urged in favor of giving up the power of Congress to terminate this extra allowance, is that the additional compensation allowed by the act of 1852 was designed to increase permanently the total payment for the mail service of the Collins line. I showed, when I last addressed the Senate, that the honorable Senator from Texas, [Mr. RUSK,] who was a friend of this line at that time, and who is now a friend of it, urging its claims with his accustomed zeal and ability, proposed the proviso reserving to Congress the power to give this notice. I should say, perhaps, in fairness and justice to that honorable Senator, that he did not originate the proviso, but that he proposed it as a substitute for a proposition which emanated from the honorable Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. RUSK. With the permission of the honorable Senator I will make an explanation of this matter. I have not examined the records on that point, but I remember the facts very distinctly. The proposition came from some quarter to give this additional allowance. I did not make that proposition, nor do I remember by whom it was made. But there was a proposition to amend the bill by giving this additional allowance, limited to the 31st day of December, 1854. In that shape that allowance would have terminated on that day, unless there had been action by Congress to continue it. Every one remembers the stormy debate, like that which has arisen at this time, which occurred upon that amendment. I then offered the proviso that Congress should give the notice, putting the onus upon Congress to originate the notice.

The Senator from Ohio does me injustice in saying that I have supported this measure from the beginning. My object was, therefore, to make it permanent. Not being able to do that, in consequence of the amendment which was offered, I desired then to put the onus upon Congress, if they saw proper, at the end of that time, to reduce the additional allowance. My opinion was, that when the 31st of December arrived, this line of steamers, about which so much had been said, which had been so fruitful a theme for speeches, would remunerate the Government; and I will show the honorable Senator hereafter—for I do not wish to interrupt him now—that we are on the point of being fully reimbursed for every dollar of outlay in this service.

Mr. CHASE. The fact remains as I stated. The proposition was then made, and nothing whatever was said at that time upon the subject of making this provision permanent—nothing whatever. The Senator from Tennessee, [Mr. BELL,] as he will remember, desired that the power of Congress to give the notice should accrue at an earlier period than the 31st of December, 1854—as early as the 30th of June. The distinguished Senator from Michigan [Mr. CASS] wished that Congress should have the power to terminate the contract still earlier—as early as January, 1854; but by some sort of general understanding, it was finally concluded that Congress should have power to terminate it on the 31st of December. That was the final decision of the Senate.

Now, what inducements were held out to Congress. It is said that this was to be a permanent arrangement. I hold in my hand the Globe, containing the report of the discussion which arose upon this subject. The Senator from Tennessee expressed his views upon it. He said he desired that this power of Congress should accrue as early as the 30th of June, and, on offering an amendment to that effect, remarked:

"In the second place, it reduces the time six months, for which this bill makes the allowance; which time I, and several other gentlemen, think is long enough to give this line this increased allowance of $33,000 per trip. We think that in that time they will have received sufficient to cover the loss which they have sustained in being the pioneers in establishing an American trans-Atlantic line of steamers, having to run it at first, no doubt, at great loss—perhaps, as they say, of as much as $16,000 or $17,000 per trip."

The Senator from Texas, commenting upon what fell from the Senator from Tennessee, and his amendment at that time, said:

"I should have no difficulty in agreeing to the amendment, because I believe that at the expiration of the proposed limitation, the proceeds of running this line of steamers will be sufficiently remunerative; and that the proprietors"—

I ask the attention of Senators to this—

"and that the proprietors will not desire to have the increase of compensation extended to them beyond that time; but here is the difficulty."

The Senator went on to explain his objections to the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee; but it is not necessary to read further.

Thus it is clear that the idea held out at that time by the friends of the line, was, before notice could be given under the proviso, the proceeds of the running of the line would be sufficiently remunerative to cover the losses which had been sustained by the proprietors; and then that the increased allowance might be discontinued. I do not say that some Senators had not the idea of a permanent provision being made for the line; it is quite possible that they had; but I say that the inducement held out to the Senate at that time was that by the 31st of December, 1854, the line would be indemnified for its losses, and that nobody contended that $858,000 a year was to be a permanent rate of compensation for transporting these mails.

What, then, becomes of the principal argument which has been addressed to the Senate during the discussions upon this subject? That argument is that the rate of 1852 was intended as a permanent compensation, not to be withdrawn unless for good cause, such as non-performance or malperformance by the proprietors of their duties under the contract. When that allowance was made, it was made upon no such consideration as that. It was made upon the consideration that they had sustained a loss; and that for a time it was necessary to grant the additional compensation in order to indemnify them for that loss; and the power of terminating the extra allowance was reserved to Congress, not for the purpose of guarding against the violation of the contract, but in order that Congress might exercise a fair discretion in continuing or discontinuing the additional compensation as the general public interest might require.

Another argument has been urged. We have been told that the advantages of this line to the commerce of the country are cheaply paid for by the full sum of $858,000 per annum. The honorable Senator from Michigan [Mr. STUART] supposes that it saves $10,000,000 a year in interest upon remittances. How is that? What are the elements of that calculation? First, the Senator says that the greater speed of the Collins steamers as compared with those of the Cunard line, amounts to one hundred and four days a year; that these remittances amount to $500,000,000; that the interest for the one hundred and four days is $10,000,000; and consequently that that amount is saved to the country. The argument assumes first, that these remittances are made in cash, when they are in fact for the most part made in bills; second, that the money remittances would be actively employed during the time of transit; third, that all remittances are made by the Collins line. Besides these errors of assumption, there is also a grievous error in calculation. Anybody who will take the trouble to make the computation of the annual saving in time on the twenty-six trips, according to the authority on which the Senator relies, will see that it is only forty-nine days and a fraction—say fifty days in all. Taking the other element of the Senator's estimate as correct, $500,000,000 of remittances, and actual loss of interest for the whole time, the saving by increased speed, instead of $10,000,000, would only be $4,000,000.

I do not go into this for the purpose of calling in question the utility of swift conveyance, or of disparaging, in any way, this line; but to show what loose and careless statements are advanced here in the Senate, and put forth to the country as arguments fit to determine our decision upon this question. Sir, commercial exchanges would go on if the Collins line had no existence. Through the competition of private enterprise, in my judgment, the business of the country would be as great, if not greater—as cheap, certainly, and in my judgment, much cheaper facilities than those which this line supplies.

Another argument in favor of making the increased compensation of 1852 permanent, is derived from the alleged receipts from the postages earned by it. The Senator from Michigan said that already the receipts from postages were nearly equal to the payment by the Government; and he seemed confidently to anticipate that the line would soon return in postages the annual amount paid to it. The Senator from Tennessee [Mr. JONES] has already exposed this assumption: so has also the Senator from Georgia, [Mr. TOOMBS.] Reimbursement by postages! I shall not restate the arguments of the Senators from Georgia and Tennessee; but I ask attention to the statement of the Postmaster General, which I hold in my hand. These are the words:

"Revenue to the United States, and also to the United States Post Office Department, per Collins line, for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1854."

Observe it is a statement of the revenue derived from the Collins line. Now what was it?

"Net revenue to Post Office Department, with United States inland postage included, $203,670 89."

Mr. RUSK. Does the Senator know what is the revenue now derived? The statement which he has read relates to 1853–'4.

Mr. CHASE. I do not; but judging from the natural increase of business, it must be something more now than it was six or eight months ago. Does the Senator know? If he does, I should be happy to hear from him. I take this statement from the official report. I do not know how else to look for correct information.

Let me repeat the statement, with an addition:

Net revenue to Post Office Department, with United States inland postage included	$208,670 89
Deduct United States inland on British mails five twenty-fourths of $265,407 75	55,293 28
Total net revenue to the Post Office Department, without United States inland	$153,377 61

So the total net revenue for the last fiscal year is $208,670 89. But it seems a deduction is to be made even from that sum, of which, however, I will say nothing at present.

I cannot tell at what rate the receipts come in now. But, admit that it is at the rate of $250,000, what then? We are paying $858,000 for $250,000 per year. The Senator says this service is now upon the eve of paying for itself. These documents show that the reverse is true. Here is another example of the loose statements which are made here for the purpose of inducing the Senate to consent to the withdrawal of the whole control of Congress over the contract.

Mr. RUSK. I dislike to interrupt the Senator, but I presume it would be just as well for him to have the information now.

The PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Ohio yield the floor?

Mr. CHASE. Yes, sir.

Mr. RUSK. I desire to make a very brief statement to the Senate. I have inquired into this matter. I am glad that I have had some information communicated to me by the Assistant Postmaster General, this morning, which comes very near making me a true prophet. I find by that statement that the total revenue derived from the mails received by the steamer Pacific on the 30th of December, 1854, was $13,391 15. The total amount of revenue on the mails sent by the steamer Pacific on the 27th December, 1854, was $18,500 24. Taking that calculation, then it comes to this: we have paid out $33,391 27 for that trip. We have received back $31,891 51, showing a loss to the Government on that trip of $1,108 49.

Mr. HUNTER rose.

Mr. RUSK. I will give it all fairly. The honorable Senator from Virginia need not be in the least uneasy. I do not think I ever have intentionally misrepresented any information which I had in my possession. I do not intend, certainly, to do it at this time. I know where the shoe pinches.

By the Atlantic, then, on the 1st of January, 1855, there was received $12,064 57. By the same ship, on the 10th January, there were sent mails which yielded a revenue of $16,305 77. Counting that up, we paid for the round trip $33,000, and we received back $28,310 34, so that there was a loss to the Government on that trip of $2,689 34.

I know that the Postmaster General, in the statement of the net revenue which the honorable Senator has just mentioned, makes a deduction from this amount; and I will state that: "deduct British and United States inland postage, eight twenty-fourths, $3,392 56, and commissions to postmasters, $2,731 31." Let us see whether this ought to be deducted or not; and the honorable Senator, as soon as I state the case, will see that it is an improper deduction. By the postal treaty which we have with Great Britain—I hope I am not trespassing on the time of the Senate in making other statements, which, perhaps, do not directly come in here—there were five cents added to every letter, in order to cover our inland postage. There were three cents added to every letter carried to England in order to cover the English inland postage; and, by the way, that provision of the treaty was made, because the Government had really passed the law to establish this Collins line. Before, they were charging forty-eight cents instead of the twenty-four cents which they now charge upon each letter. The British steamers, which were then running without any American line in opposition, were charging forty-eight cents on each letter, and the British post office was pocketing the difference, which made it just double. These letters are now charged twenty-four cents. If they were held at the old British postage, the figures would be just double. Three fourths of the letters which came by these mails were delivered in the city of New York, I have no doubt, and there is no expense incurred in the inland postage. Is it, therefore, right to deduct that? I apprehend that it is not right to deduct that item. It is an advantage which we get to be sure, on the inland postage, but it is an advantage to the Government that five cents are paid on letters which are to be delivered in New York without expense to the Government in transporting them inland at all. Then, as to the commissions of the postmasters; it is only necessary to state that they have been deducted from the Collins line, though they ought to come out of the revenue of the United States. There is no obligation in the contract to pay the commissions of postmasters.

The Assistant Postmaster General, when he handed me these statements, said there was nothing in them but what he knew to be correct. There might possibly be some mails that were not included. There is the nearness with which this comes to my prediction, that the line would soon repay us.

Mr. HUNTER. The Senator from Texas has shown one side of the account; but I do not think he states the other correctly. I hold in my hand an estimate of three trips, one by the Atlantic, another by the Baltic, and a third by the Pacific. That estimate is furnished by the Post Office Department, and according to it, the net revenue for one trip was $9,420, from the second, $5,120, and from the third, $6,263, making something like $21,000 net from the three trips.

Mr. RUSK. What were the dates?

Mr. HUNTER. The Atlantic sent the 10th January, 1855, the Baltic received the 11th January, 1855, and the Pacific received 5th January, 1855.

Now, observe that this is the most favorable statement which can be made for the line; and how the Senator can say that we ought not to deduct the inland postage, I cannot imagine; because the Government has to bear all the expense of conveying these letters and of conveying the closed mails to the British Province of Canada. Surely we ought to deduct what it costs from the receipts of the line. It costs us this much to carry them. We charge five cents, I think it is, on the inland postage; surely it costs us that amount. Nor is it unfair to charge the revenue account of the Collins line with its proportion of the expenses in collecting the post office revenue, and that is done in this statement, so that it will be found, I think, even if we take the most favorable view, that the receipts of the line are very far behind the sum necessary to compensate for what is paid by the United States.

Mr. RUSK. I do not think the honorable Senator intended to produce a wrong impression, but he has not put down the receipts of the round voyage. The Collins line receive $33,000 for the out and incoming voyage, or the round trip. The Senator's statement only includes the postages for one way.

Mr. HUNTER. That is the gross sum. If it was $7,000 one trip, it would be only $14,000 for the gross sum, and twenty-six times $14,000 is very far short of $858,000.

Mr. RUSK. I think the honorable Senator will not insist upon that. The $33,000 are paid for the trip out and back, and the honorable Senator from Virginia, to get at a loss, only counts up what is made by the trip one way.

Mr. HUNTER. I double that for the amount of the round trip, and I repeat that twenty-six times $14,000 falls very far short of $858,000. The Senator from Texas takes the gross revenue without making the proper deduction, and selects a trip or two on which their receipts were the largest. He does not take the general average of their receipts per trip, as he ought to do, to make the calculation proper and fair.

Mr. CHASE. I yield with very great pleasure to Senators for correction and explanation. I have no wish to make a speech. All I desire to do is to explain the reasons which, in my judgment, require me, in the discharge of my public duty, to submit the proposition which I have made. The Senator from Texas now undertakes to show that this service remunerates the United States within a small sum. He gives a statement in regard to two trips; but, sir, all calculations founded on a trip here, or a trip there, must, of necessity, be illusory. I observed one point, in which, it seems to me, the honorable Senator failed in giving a full explanation, even of those trips. He did not deduct the British share of the postages, which is a very important item; but he stated it as if the whole postage receipts of the Collins line went into the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. RUSK. The honorable Senator is grossly mistaken. I deducted the British postages, and so stated it. Here is the statement of the Assistant Postmaster General, deducting the United States and British inland postages—eight twenty-fourths. The Senator says I did not deduct the British postages. The statement does deduct them. I stated as distinctly as words could state, that in the postal treaty, five cents were added to every letter for the United States inland, and three for the British inland; and in the statement there is deducted five twenty-fourths for the American, and three twenty-fourths for the British, making eight twenty-fourths altogether.

Mr. CHASE. That may be so. I have not seen the statement which the Senator quotes. But I was about to say that taking the statement just as made by the Senator from Texas, it gives only the result of two trips; while, on the authority of the Post Office Department, I give the result of the whole year. Which is the more reliable? The statement of two trips, which may have been more than usually remunerative and profitable, or the statement of the Department, extending through a whole year? I hold in my hand a statement of the Postmaster General, showing the gross receipts during the whole time of the contract thus far. It commences on the 27th of April, 1850, and runs up to June 30, 1854. Now, how much do you think were the gross receipts? Why, $1,000,000, and a little fraction over. How much were the net receipts to the General Government? Why, $900,000, and a fraction over. Call it $1,000,000, and what then has been the average gross income from this service, for which we pay the enormous sum of $858,000, near $1,000,000? Less than $250,000 a year? According to the statement of the Postmaster General less than that was received last year. It may be more hereafter. I hope it will; I believe it will; but then it cannot reach a sum which will justify the anticipation of remunerative receipts, which is entertained by the Senator from Texas. Certainly there is nothing in the present circumstances or future prospects of receipts from this line which will warrant the continuance of the extra compensation, against the understanding of 1852, which, as I have shown, contemplated the discontinuance of that compensation, at least, as soon as the Collins associates had been indemnified for their losses. It was supposed and stated that this indemnity would be realized by the 31st of December, 1854. But now what are we asked to do? To appropriate this additional sum for the current year? No; nobody objects to that. The notice has not been given, and the $850,000 must be paid for this year. What then? To surrender absolutely all right to give the notice in future; to exempt these contractors absolutely from all liability to the discontinuance of the $50,000 additional compensation, which was originally intended to be temporary; to leave them to act as they see fit in every respect, speed as well as others, within the terms of their original contract. That, sir, is the proposition.

I have never shown any disposition to deal unjustly or unfairly by this line. It will be remembered by Senators that, during the last session of Congress, when it was proposed to give the notice in advance of the 31st of December, 1854, I said—what I felt to be just—that the line had a right to the whole time up to the 31st of December to show to the country the merits of its service, so that Congress might determine upon the whole case up to that time, whether the notice should be given or not. I voted with those who were against giving the notice at that time, because I thought simple justice required it. Although I was opposed to the original appropriation, I was not willing, upon any consideration, to depart from the line which, in my judgment, simple truth, honor, and justice required me to pursue. This is enough, therefore, to show that I feel no sentiment of hostility towards this company.

Now, sir, what is the proposition that I have submitted to the Senate? All I have said is intended to illustrate the fairness of it? I propose simply that the Senate, since it has determined to relinquish the control of the notice over this line, shall require some concession from the contractors corresponding to the benefit which they are to receive. I propose, since the Senate has determined to concur in the proposition of the House, and surrender the power to give notice, to require of the contractors a consent in some limitation in point of time. The contract was originally for $385,000. In 1852, the sum of $473,000 was added as temporary compensation. They have now had the benefit of that for three years. From 1852 up to 1855, they have had the benefit of this more than duplication of the original contract compensation. Give them that double compensation for one year or two years longer, if it is necessary; but then, after that, recur to the ordinary policy of the Government, and place this line, as well as every other line, as you reach it, under the control of the Post Office Department. Let the Postmaster General advertise for contracts. Let those contracts be reported to Congress, with a view to such general legislation as may be adopted, as will regulate the discretion of the Postmaster General in making permanent arrangements. Is there anything unjust in that? It gives the additional compensation. It gives it without the power to withdraw it. It gives it for two years. We were assured that they would be remunerated in 1854, but this still gives the additional compensation two years longer—up to 1857. It insures to these contractors about $1,000,000 over what was contemplated by the act of 1852. It only requires consent on their part that the contract shall then be put upon the footing of all other mail contracts. What then will be the condition of the proprietors of this line? Better, certainly, than that of anybody else in relation to this service. They can come in with their propositions. They will have their ships. They will have their experience. They will have their skilled and practiced officers. They can compete with great advantage for the contract for this service. Ought they not to be required to consent to this? Having all these advantages, can they not offer better terms to the Government than other persons? If they do, will they not get the contract for an additional term? It seems to me nothing can be more fair, nothing clearer than this.

We have been told about the necessity of having these lines. Sir, you will have steam lines whether the patronage of the Government be extended to them or not. American energy, American enterprise, and American skill, with the impulse which they have already received from the past patronage of the Government, can defy the world. I have not the slightest fear but that we shall be able to compete on the ocean, as we compete on the land, with any nation on the face of the earth. Let the energies of the people be unrestricted and unconfined; give no extraordinary patronage to particular ports or to particular lines, and, my word for it, you will have a competition which will more than make good all the promises made in behalf of this line. Let us have competition. That is said to be the life of trade. That is the best security of the Government against imposition by favorites and particular contractors. I have no fears whatever but that the wants of the community will be met; that the postages will be cheapened, instead of being made dearer, and that passages upon the ocean will be as swift and as cheap as they are now. For one, sir, I do not want a splendid Government. I desire no excessive revenues. I am against this lavish expenditure with both hands. I wish to see the national revenues diminished. Limited revenue is the only guarantee. Economical expenditure, moderate revenue, and light taxes will make a frugal Government and a rich people; and if we adopt the amendment which I have had the honor to submit, it will be a step towards economy—not a great step, I admit, but still a step in the right direction. I trust it may be taken.

Mr. BAYARD. I should not have taken any part in this discussion if, as I had hoped, it had been disposed of yesterday. The opponents of the bill as it came from the House determined, however, that the discussion should be continued; at least I judge so from the votes which were taken on questions of adjournment; and the debate took such a course that I feel myself compelled to make some remarks in reference to the amendment before the Senate, not because I have any hope of changing the vote of any Senators in reference to this proposition, but because I consider the course of debate has been such as to require, for my own justification, that I should give a brief explanation of the reasons which will govern my vote.

Mr. President, when the system was adopted by Congress, following the example of Great Britain, of providing vessels intended to be auxiliary to the Navy in the event of war, and to be employed during peace in the transportation of the mails, I was not a member of this body, nor for several years after. It was in full operation when I became a member. If, however, I had been here, in accordance with the principles which, on a former occasion, I stated to the Senate, I should have been disinclined to adopt the system except in cases where a rival line existed, which was supported by the money or the Treasury of another Government. In that excepted case only would I have been content that the Government of the United States should connect itself with any system of the kind, and should have preferred leaving it otherwise to individual enterprise. But the system was established.

After Congress had determined upon that course, at the solicitation of the Government, Mr. Collins and his associates embarked in this enterprise, which was new and untried to them, and which, like all other new and untried enterprises, necessarily involved expenditures and disappointments which human judgment and human sagacity could not foresee. They embarked in it in good faith, and as I shall show before I have done, whatever may be the technicalities of their contract, they have carried it out substantially and fully in good faith, so as to promote the purposes and objects intended to be effected by Congress. Finding that the expenses in the new enterprise were far greater than they anticipated, and that there were additional difficulties to be encountered in the want of means for the construction of machinery adapted to the class of vessels necessary to effect the objects of the Government—(for to have constructed an inferior class of vessels, unequal in speed to the existing line established by the British Government would have been idle)—which involved the investment of a capital of nearly $3,000,000, and current monthly expenditures far beyond their calculations, in 1852 they came before Congress, made a statement of the facts, and Congress, after full investigation and discussion, agreed to extend the compensation which they were entitled to receive under the contract. The British Government had done the same thing in reference to their line on two several occasions; and on similar grounds Congress adopted that policy.

I do not mean to go into the details, but to state, as briefly as I can, the course of proceeding in this matter.

There was attached to the bill which increased the compensation a proviso, leaving it within the discretion of Congress to withdraw the additional compensation at any time, with six months' notice, after the 31st of December, 1854. I did not approve of that proviso then, and subsequent experience has strengthened my convictions of its impolicy. In March, 1853, under representations made of the large expenditures upon all the mail steamer lines, Congress authorized advertisements to be issued by the Postmaster General, with the view to ascertain at what prices the services performed by them respectively could be accomplished. I shall notice that advertisement hereafter; I believe it has not been yet referred to in this debate.

The natural belief on the part of the contractors, and of every other man was, that in the reservation of the power to revoke the additional allowance, Congress would be governed in its exercise, not by caprice, not by the assailing efforts of individuals outside of the body, nor by any other influence than a fair inquiry into the matter. That the additional grant would not be recalled but for just reasons, and after investigation demonstrating an altered state of facts, with the ceasing of the necessity upon which the grant was made, was a fair and rational inference, in my judgment, as to the future action of Congress under the power of revocation. But what, in fact, has since ensued? In 1854, just before the close of the session of Congress, when there was in the House of Representatives a bare quorum present—one hundred and thirty-two members, the vote being forty-seven to eighty-five, one hundred and two being absent—although it was at least questionable, and, in my judgment, certain, that by the true construction of that proviso, the time had not arrived at which Congress could give the notice in good faith, the House passed a bill authorizing and requiring the notice to be given by the Postmaster General; and this without investigation, or sufficient cause. When that bill came to this body, there was also a bare quorum here, and the notice was stricken out by a majority of only two votes. I draw very different conclusions from these votes from those of the Senator from Tennessee, [Mr. JONES.] At the present session, in a full House, and after a prolonged discussion, the same body which, with a bare quorum, last year passed by a large majority a bill requiring the notice to be given peremptorily before the proper time arrived, have this year, after a careful investigation, by a decided, though not a large majority, determined not only that they would not give the notice, but experience had shown that it was unwise that this provision should exist in the contract. Was it not a just conclusion?

These contractors have embarked in this matter a very large capital. They are carrying on one of the most expensive undertakings that could well be imagined. If they found that, at each session of Congress, they were liable to be placed in a position in which this allowance might be withdrawn, not upon a judgment founded on information afforded to Congress, not upon a consideration of the commercial interests of the country, but upon the mere caprice of Congress—was it not natural that they should wish to get rid of that provision, especially when, in consequence of the loss of one vessel, which they were originally bound by Congress to construct, they were under the necessity of constructing another in its place at a cost of $700,000—was it not natural, under these circumstances, that they should wish to have some certainty as to their future prospects, some certainty after their contract had lasted for five years, and left them still absolute losers under it, and had but five years more to run, with all the time, labor, and anxiety which had been involved in the business, that they would be permitted to make up for the losses sustained, and secure some reasonable profit under the contract? It was a reasonable desire; and I think the judgment of the House of Representatives in determining to abandon this proviso, was a natural consequence, arising from the precipitate action of a mere quorum of the body at the close of the last session of Congress. This is the view I take of the legislation here, Mr. President. The danger to these contractors when they are called upon to construct another steamer at a cost of $600,000 or $700,000, is the liability which exists to the exercise of this discretionary power by Congress, not upon grounds of investigation, not upon grounds of justice, but upon grounds, such as I have stated, either on the interference of other persons who desire to make a profit, and yet who were unwilling to incur the risk of loss in the first instance, or on the mere caprice of some individual members in bringing the matter before Congress, when there is no time for investigation and deliberate action.

Under these circumstances it is not to be expected, it would not be rational to suppose, that the contractors would not desire, in their future operations, that they should have some certainty as to the compensation which they were to receive. On the part of the Government, I deem it a wise measure to abandon this power, because, otherwise, we shall have this question constantly brought before us. If we were to agree to the recommendation of the Committee of Finance, which does not propose to give the notice, but merely to retain the power, there would be but three years of the contract remaining when any notice could be given, and the saving would be too trivial, in my judgment, to justify keeping the amount of the allowance in a state of uncertainty, when the law, as it now stands, requires this additional vessel to be built.

What are the objections to this application? for I take it for granted that the contractors have applied to be relieved from this clause in the law of 1852. I do not know that it is so, but I take it for granted; and the House of Representatives have seen fit, after discussion, to agree to that application, and repeal the proviso in the law of 1852. What are the objections, sir? The first is, that it is the invariable practice of the Government, in all its mail contracts, to reserve the right to determine the contract within the term to which it is originally limited by the executive officer. I concede that such is the practice; I concede that such a practice is a wise and proper one; but, like all other rules, it has its exceptions; and I hold that you cannot properly apply such a rule, whether leaving it to the discretion of Congress, which is a most unfit body, as its previous action shows, or to that of an executive officer, to terminate a contract of this kind; for the reason, that the character of the service is one that requires such an amount of capital to be embarked, that you can get no man or set of men to make an original contract, no matter whether for five, or six, or ten years, subject to the right of the Government to reserve such a discretion.

In the original contract with these parties, there is no such provision. You granted it for ten years. Why did you do it? For the very reason which I have stated. Honorable Senators here, within the past few days, when they were desirous of aiding in the construction of a railroad from the Pacific to the Mississippi, did not hesitate to require that a contract should be entered into for fifteen years, for the payment of not exceeding $300 a mile for the transportation of the mail on that road. I was opposed to that bill on other grounds, which I thought legitimate and right; but there was no hesitation, no difficulty, in providing that the contract, under such circumstances, should be extended for fifteen years, without any proviso of a right to decrease the allowance at the discretion of Congress.

Mr. President, undoubtedly the general practice and rule of the Government, applying to the ordinary transactions of the Post Office Department, in giving a discretion to the Postmaster General, is a wise and reasonable regulation; but when you attempt to apply it to a line of steamships established for particular purposes, one purpose in case of war, and a distinct purpose and use in peace—which involves a capital of millions of dollars, and an enormous annual expenditure—which is to be a rival to the line established by the Government of Great Britain, and supported by the Treasury of Great Britain, you should not expect capitalists to enter into a contract with a condition attached that it shall be in the discretion either of the executive or of the legislative department to terminate the allowance. In making the additional grant, no doubt those who reserved the right had the power to do so. The question is, whether it was wise to do so? I think it better, from our experience, to abandon the right.

There is, at least, connected with this contract one merit to which the parties are entitled. They embarked in a new and untried business, and at the solicitation of the Government; and the moment they did so, the Government of Great Britain established an additional line between New York and Liverpool, and the effect of the establishment of our line led to the postal treaty with Great Britain. Though that postal treaty is unequal and imperfect in many respects, yet it is better than any previous state of affairs. Though its inequalities ought to be remedied, it is not by the abandonment of this line that you can expect to reach that result.

I have stated the character of the enterprise, and the magnitude of the capital involved in this matter, together with the fact that they had to contend with a line backed by the Treasury of Great Britain, which placed it in a very different position from our ordinary contracts for postal service throughout the country, whether by land or by water.

The next objection is, that we are paying for this line an enormous sum, greater than you could establish a line for, and that great profits will be made under it. Now, sir, under our discretionary power, beyond all question, if we should find that exorbitant profits are to be made by this line, it would be a perfectly just cause, in my judgment, for repealing the extra allowance; but when you come to investigate the facts, when you have sworn statements, giving the details of every voyage of these steamers down to 1855, giving the expenses of each one, and the disbursements of each one, and showing the difference between the expenditures and the receipts, under the contract, from all sources, you find, when you make the ordinary and necessary allowance for depreciation from use, and for the mere interest upon the capital which is involved, that the owners of this line, after an existence of five years, are positive losers. Although the Senator from Tennessee may say that that has nothing to do with the contract, does it not enter into the equity of the case, as to whether Congress shall withdraw the additional allowance which they made on the ground that these men, having embarked in the contract with good faith, had performed it in good faith? I speak not of the technicalities of the contract; but is it not an answer to the position, that now you ought to withdraw that allowance, when they show you fairly and fully that they are yet under an actual loss; and that, after five years of continual struggle, they have succeeded in establishing a line which not only equals, but excels, the line which was established years before by Great Britain, with all the advantages which it had of being an established line?

Though it be perfectly true that, owing to the contingency of the war in Europe, a portion of the line established by Great Britain has been withdrawn, it is but a temporary withdrawal, and there is no evidence, there is no attempt to show that there can be any extraordinary profits derived during the next five years. But if they do make large profits hereafter, according to my sense of justice, they are fairly entitled to them, and will not be extravagantly remunerated for the hazards they have encountered, and the success they have achieved. They embarked in this business at your own solicitation; they have performed their contract, as I say, in good faith; and having done so, I should not hesitate, after having made the grant of additional compensation, and finding they are still losers, to say that it is impossible, during the five years remaining, that they can make any more than a reasonable remuneration for the losses which they have sustained. Does any gentleman suppose that they entered into an operation of this kind with the mere view of making only seven per cent. interest upon their money, while they were hazarding the loss and destruction of their capital? Would that remunerate them for the time, labor, and anxiety of mind, and the chances of entire loss which are involved in such a business? Treat such contractors as some Senators seem disposed to treat them, and you will look in vain, in the future, for any contracts being made with the Government by persons who really can carry them out in good faith.

Sir, these contractors have been losers hitherto. The statement which you have here distinctly made, and sworn to by one of the clerks, or by the secretary of the company, in which he gives the disbursements of each ship and the receipts from every source, proves that taking the entire receipts from passengers, and freight, and the mails, from the commencement of the line until the 17th of February, 1855, you have receipts amounting to $7,874,773 34, and disbursements for the mere running expenses, expenses actually incurred and paid, $7,207,291 91, leaving what is called in the statement, a surplus—but it is not a surplus—leaving the difference between the expenditures and receipts in the period of five years which the contract has run, with a capital of $3,000,000 involved, but $667,481 47. This neither includes the loss by depreciation, which of necessity enters into all steaming operations, nor does it include the mere interest on the money. When you come to deduct the losses which have been actually sustained, the loss of the ill-fated Arctic, and the depreciation on the other vessels according to the settled experience of men who have been engaged in the business, and the interest of seven per cent. on the capital, you find that they are still out of pocket, or in other words, they have not received their expenditures, over the loss by depreciation and the interest at seven per cent., by the sum of $253,924. They are still losers to that amount, and that, too, after the contract has been going on for five years, three of them being since the additional compensation was made. You have no counter-evidence to this that can possibly meet it. You have the case presented to you precisely on the same grounds on which you granted the additional allowance. These men having entered into a contract in good faith, and having carried out the objects which you had in view in good faith, you would not suffer them to be destroyed under the operation of the contract, but made them an additional grant, reserving to yourselves this contingent right of revocation without determining what your policy would be when the contract should expire. Ought not the same considerations to induce you, looking at the probable profits of the last five years of their contract to abandon that right, and prevent a further agitation of the matter, which is injurious to the contractors, and without benefit to the Government.

In connection with this, I may be allowed to remark on the figures of the honorable Senator from Tennessee, [Mr. JONES.] He gives us a statement to the effect, I believe, that something over $7,000,000 will be paid to this company during the whole time of their contract; and we are told that it is monstrous that such a sum should be paid on a capital of but $3,000,000! He even attempts to underrate the amount of the capital, as I understood him, by showing that but something over $1,500,000 were subscribed, and that the rest was borrowed. Be it so. But, surely, if it was not subscribed but borrowed, it forms a part of the capital of the enterprise. The vessels, beyond all question, cost nearly $2,900,000. There must have been incidental expenses in the establishment of the line which would run the amount up to $3,000,000; and though that may not all have been subscribed, though some of it may have been borrowed, it forms part of the capital. But waiving all that, whether their capital is $2,000,000 or $3,000,000, it is immaterial; there is really nothing in the argument—though I heard it once before on this floor—that there is any impropriety in a large annual grant, because the amount of the grant appears great in reference to the capital employed. You have not a common ordinary horse conveyance of the mail in the country in reference to which the annual amount which you pay does not probably quadruple the amount of actual capital invested. It is constantly the case. You make the grant founded on the running expenses as well as on the capital; and, therefore, all this parade of figures of the amount which you pay should be weighed with reference, if justly presented, to the expenditures which are necessary to carry on the business, and also to the objects which the Government desires to attain. In this case the mere receipts of postage did not constitute the only object which the Government had in view. I shall not enter into the details on that matter, because I am not sufficiently conversant with them. It is an unquestioned fact, however, that, in regard to the postal service, you have derived the benefit of the establishment of the postal treaty from the establishment of this line; and it is another unquestioned fact that the receipts of postages through the line have been increasing steadily from its first establishment, and that against discriminations on continental letters by Great Britain, most unjust and unequal to us, under the operation of that treaty. I do not pause now to enter into the facts with which the Senate is familiar. Under all these circumstances, there has been an advance and increase of postage year by year. But, further, Mr. President, when this question was mooted in the Senate, in 1852, I said, and I still think, that it was very probable that the postages might not equal the amount of the disbursement during the period of the contract. I saw no reason, then, when I looked to the nationality of the interest which I conceived was embarked in this line, why the Government should abandon the contract into which it induced the parties to enter, although it did not get an exact remuneration in money, from the postages, for the amount which it was paying to the contractors. I think so still.

The facts may be summed up thus. Your own citizens, at the invitation of the Government, through one of your Government officers, the Postmaster General, and at his solicitation, embarked in this enterprise, which was a new and untried one. They found it more costly than they expected. In the progress of the contract they applied to you for an additional compensation, and after giving a statement of facts, and after a full investigation, it was granted.

Gentlemen have not shown me, nor can they show me, that the reasons which induced the Government to make that grant have ceased now. It is true, as has been stated, that the Cunard line is not now running to New York, but it has been called off by the exigency of the war in Europe; but there is nothing to show us that it will not be reëstablished. Beyond all question the expenses connected with the running of a steamer between Liverpool and New York, have been increased in the last two years, and no reason has been given for altering now the determination of Congress in making the grant at that time, which would not as fully have existed then. When you have a further appeal made by your citizens, showing that, having embarked in this matter, they are still, after five years' service, losers by their contract, is it asking too much to have this restriction removed, so that they may not be liable to be called here at each successive session of Congress, to defend the grant which was made to them in 1852, when they succeeded in showing that the amount then granted was but a fair compensation for the services performed?

It may be perfectly true, therefore, that, within the terms of the contract originally made, you are only bound to pay a certain sum per trip, and that, under your additional grant, though you are bound to pay $33,000 per trip, you have the power to revoke the additional allowance if you see fit; but unless some malperformance is shown on the part of the contractors, or the fact is proved that they receive exorbitant profits, though it may be in your power, I deny the equity and justice of such an act on the part of the Government of this country. The two reasons which I have specified are, in my judgment, the only two which could justify that act.

Again, Mr. President, we are told, as another reason why this power to give notice should be retained, that an offer has been made to run mail steamers on this line by another person (Captain Vanderbilt) for a much less sum than is now paid by the Government to the Collins line. Mr. President, suppose it be so; I think I do no injustice to Captain Vanderbilt in saying that, though he is a very shrewd and a very sagacious man, thoroughly acquainted with steamboat matters, and a very enterprising man, yet his offer, uncertain as it is in many respects, should not be regarded. Sir, the circumstances are these: He comes here, in my judgment, as an interloper. When, five or seven years ago, the Government was willing to enter into a contract which he might have entered into as well as others, when the business was new and untried, and all the difficulties connected with it were to be encountered, he shrunk from it, and left the hazard to others. Yet now, when what was then a new line, running against an established line, has become itself an established line, he steps in, and offers to perform it for a less sum, although the contract which was made by the Government with the other parties who have undergone all the expense and difficulties and hazards of a new enterprise has not expired. He offers to perform this work for a less sum, having the benefit of their knowledge, and of their previous labor in establishing a line successfully, which is the great difficulty in all transactions of this sort. Sir, this proposition meets with no favor at my hands.

But further, Mr. President, I doubt the whole character of the proposition, and I will give the reasons for it. On our tables were laid, after this bill had passed the House, printed propositions from Captain Vanderbilt, which disclose nothing but the fact that he is willing to contract to run a line, without any description of the vessels which he would employ, and without any allegation as to the time which he would make between Liverpool and New York, for $15,000 a trip. That is the proposition? When, in answer to the honorable Senator from Tennessee, [Mr.

JONES,] I showed that, within the terms of that offer, such a line might well be run, and make a profit, while the Collins line, running at the speed that they do, would experience a loss—that, running inferior vessels, and running at a slower speed, such a line might be kept up for that sum, and yet that the Government would lose by the operation, in postages, an amount quite equal to the difference in cost between the two lines, then the Senator from Tennessee stated that Captain Vanderbilt had assured him that he was willing to make the Collins time, or the Cunard time, I do not know which, for $15,000 a trip. Sir, when a man comes here, and has his agents here for the purpose of acting upon the legislation of Congress, and preventing the passage of a provision intended for the benefit of men who entered into a contract when the business was one of uncertainty, indeed almost an unknown business, and when it was impossible to estimate the expenditures which would have to be incurred, when he occupies that position, lies by, and makes no such proposition while the matter is being investigated before one body, and not until he finds that it is carried, and that his schemes are defeated, does he come forward with his verbal assurance that he would do the same work for a less sum; are we to legislate on such a state of facts, and take the chances of whether he will comply with that assurance or not? Such considerations ought not, in my judgment, to influence the legislation of Congress.

Further, Mr. President, on the 3d March, 1853, under an allegation that the Collins line, and other established lines, were expensive, you authorized the Postmaster General to advertise for proposals for the transportation of the mail between New York and Liverpool, as well as on other lines; and in answer to those proposals where was Captain Vanderbilt? No offer whatever came from him; no proposal was made by him to run a line then for $15,000 a trip. No proposition came from any source to establish a line, except one from the Galway company, which proposed to leave the sum to the discretion of Congress, and that was considered such an entirely vague proposition as to be unworthy of notice. Now, I ask, having gone through with that process before, if this offer was intended as a fair and bona fide offer, in regard to the matter of the expense for equal service, whether it would not have been made when the advertisements were issued, two years ago, and when this extra allowance had been in operation for nearly one year?

Mr. President, I consider this as a mere effort, when I look at the whole circumstances of the case, made by an opponent of this line on personal grounds, or from some other cause, (I do not know what; nor if I knew it would I state it here in the Senate; but it bears on its face indelibly the impression of something of that kind,) to defeat a proposition which he supposes will be beneficial to men and interests to which he is opposed. That certainly would never get my sanction, that would never influence my determination as a legislator.

I concede the ability of Captain Vanderbilt. I believe he is a millionaire, and that he is an enterprising man, and one of great shrewdness and capacity for business; but suppose that this offer were made by him; I ask if a question of dollars and cents would induce the Government of the United States, when it had previously entered into a contract for a period of ten years, with contractors who had embarked in the business at its solicitation, and had invested a large capital on the faith of the contract, who have lost money by the operation so far, to suffer them to be destroyed because there exists a power to withdraw the allowance and permit another party to come in and make profits at a time when—by the energy, the skill, and the enterprise of the previous contractors—they were about to be in some measure remunerated? I trust such a consideration will never influence the Senate of the United States.

Mr. President, this matter has been spoken of as if a new contract were proposed to be made by the bill under the consideration of the Senate, which has been sent to us from the House of Representatives. It is not so. The proposition is this: You are asked, under the bill from the House of Representatives, to release one of the terms of the contract which renders uncertain and unsettled the compensation which is given to those contractors, and which also, if it is released, provides that they shall build an additional ship, which will be useful for future purposes, as well as for the present. That cannot be called a new contract; it is simply a modification, or an abandonment rather, by Congress, of the right of revocation inserted in the original contract. There is no proposition to extend the time of the original contract; there is no proposition to establish a new line by these old contractors. They ask you whether, in justice not only to the country, but to them, you will not give them a certainty that they shall receive the compensation, within the terms of the contract, for the period during which it was given to them after full investigation? They ask whether you will not give them a certainty that it shall be continued during the remaining period of the original contract into which they entered, and on the condition that they shall construct an additional vessel? This is no new contract. I view it as a proposition to carry out, under this bill as it comes from the House, our original contract with the parties, in substance, in good faith, and according to the object of Congress at the time it was made.

I have stated that this contract has been performed in substance and in good faith on the part of the contractors. Let me endeavor to show that. Will any gentleman deny that as regards the postal service, the contract with Collins and his associates has been fully and faithfully carried out? You stipulated for no time. You stipulated for a certain number of vessels; but your most important stipulation was for the trips to be performed; have they failed in that? No. As to time, have not these men constructed their vessels not only regardless of expense to themselves, but in order to carry the mails in the quickest possible time, and have they not run all sorts of hazards? Have they not succeeded in giving a superiority, in point of time, to your postal service over the postal service of the established line of Great Britain, which had existed for years anterior? They have, therefore, I say, performed their contract in good faith. That they have built one vessel less than was specified is immaterial. They have performed the contract by making the trips regularly according to its terms, and making them in the quickest time, though the contract did not so require. They have made the best time that could be made, and they have spared no exertion or expense to do that.

Take the single item of loss, to show how this thing operates, which occurred within the last six months. In running up the Irish channel, one of their steamers ran into a vessel, and sunk her. That will cost them $100,000, because the courts of justice usually decide under general principles, where a steamer runs into a sailing vessel, the steamer is responsible for the injury which is done. That was not an act of carelessness; it was an act which may frequently occur, because that channel is densely crowded with vessels. It is also very liable to fogs; and yet, unless these steamers run with a certain degree of speed, they would not carry out the wishes of the commercial people of this country, in giving speed to the transmission of the mail. It is in order to accomplish that object, that they run these hazards, and these hazards they have to pay for. I recollect, on my voyage in the Pacific, we nearly came in collision with another vessel. We were running slowly at the time, about eight knots an hour. The fog was so dense that we could not see ten or twelve feet ahead, and by a rapid shifting of the helm, we barely escaped running down a vessel which must otherwise have been lost, but which, fortunately, we merely grazed, and passed without injury. These are matters of frequent occurrence, because the channel is always crowded; the fogs are incessant at particular periods of the year; but the people of this country want speed, and, in order to accomplish that, they must hazard the vessels, and run the risk of experiencing such losses. I mention this only as an incident to show that it is not through negligence that these things occur, but from a desire, regardless of expense, to carry out, in good faith, as regards the postal service, their contract with the Government, not only making their trips regularly, but making them in a time not equaled by any other line.

Mr. President, I come now to the question connected with the war steamer clause. These vessels were constructed, as indicated in the policy of the Government, for the purposes of war as well as for the purposes of the postal service in peace, and the Government has the option of taking them at a valuation. It was alleged in 1852 that they were useless for purposes of war. I admitted then what I have some doubts about now—that as between the side-wheel steamer and the propeller, the propeller was the most efficient vessel for purposes of war. I doubt it now. I shall not enter into that vexed question. I shall not venture to controvert the much superior information and knowledge on naval subjects of the honorable Senator from Florida, [Mr. MALLORY;] but there are some matters connected with this that I will allude to in order to show that he is under an error in his allegation as regards the inutility of these vessels for war purposes. I may express it as a general result, first, that of all the steamers that you have had built under this policy, the Collins line alone have complied substantially with the terms of the contract in building their vessels to suit war purposes. If it be true, according to the view of the honorable Senator from Florida, that a war steamer must be able to engage at the distance of pistol shot, broadside to broadside, then the Saranac is not a war steamer; the Susquehanna is not a war steamer; you have no war steamers in the Navy unless they be the Princeton and the San Jacinto. Where does the honorable Senator obtain his authority? He has disavowed that of Charles Stewart. Now, with all my respect for the honorable Senator, I would rather take the opinion of one of the most distinguished captains of our Navy, who has been fifty years in the service, and is thoroughly acquainted with the arts of seamanship, in regard to the fighting capacity of a vessel, than that of the honorable Senator from Florida.

Mr. President, you have the opinion of Commodore Stewart, and I want no higher opinion. I am always willing to avail myself, in matters of that kind, of the opinions of those who are particularly instructed in them. You have the opinion of Commodore Stewart, that those vessels are built for the purposes of war; you have the same opinion from Commodore Perry—and I will state further, that although originally Commodore Perry thought it might be necessary to remove the upper decks, in the event of preparing them for war steamers, he does not now entertain that opinion, as I understood from him in a personal conversation within the last few weeks. That such vessels could not fight at pistol shot I admit, but the capacity of such a vessel for war purposes does not depend on that. It is perfectly true, that, in former times, when you had sailing vessels alone, of necessity, when vessels encountered each other hostilely, they were brought into close contact in order to determine their relative superiority, because one vessel, controlled by such an element as wind, though she might have the advantage of speed, in taking her position, could not maintain that while firing upon her adversary so as to do her material injury, and prevent her approach; but with the element of steam as a motive power, where there is a decided superiority in the velocity of the vessel, then the vessel having the superior velocity, though she may not have the same number of guns on board, beyond all question, must overcome the vessel which is inferior in speed.

If a vessel is capable of carrying ten-inch guns, and throwing those projectiles used in modern warfare, one of which, the honorable Senator tells us, would be sufficient to destroy a ship if it struck her near the water line, does it not stand to reason, that if that vessel has four or five knots greater speed than her adversary, no matter what is the relative strength of the two, she can, with such an element as steam, take her position at such a distance as effectually to throw her shot, whilst exposing only her bow to the attack of her opponent? It is perfectly well known that there is an angle within which, if the bows of the vessel fall, a shot will glance when it strikes; and these vessels are constructed so sharp as to come within that angle, and, bow on, they encounter little risk of injury from a hostile vessel.

I have had a conversation, of which I took a short memorandum, with the chief engineer of your Navy. He has been in your service fourteen years. He has sailed, under the orders or permission of the Government, six voyages in the Arctic, and six in the Pacific. He has been four years in the Mississippi, and twenty-one months in the Saranac. He considers that there is no comparison in the capacity for war purposes between the Collins steamers and these vessels; that one could overpower the other, with nothing like an equal armament, with the utmost facility, owing to the difference of speed; and to illustrate that, having sailed in them all, he told me that he considered—he had no doubt—that, against a gale at sea, these Collins steamers could make five knots an hour, while any steam frigate in your Navy would be carried astern. He told me that the Collins steamers were stronger built than either of those frigates I have mentioned; that the depth being greater—the depth of the Collins steamers is six feet more than that of the Mississippi or Saranac—made them stronger for the purpose of performing their duties on the ocean. It is not, however, necessary for me to enter into the details of these matters here, even were I fully master of the subject.

Well, sir, with the superiority of speed to this extent, the vessel takes her own position; with her bows to her opponent, (unlike a sailing vessel, she can keep that position with steam, or she can go backwards or forwards,) she remains in the same relative position, spite of the efforts of her opponent to get out of it, and she remains with an elevation above the water, which by some is made an objection to these vessels, with a power in consequence of this superior elevation which gives an increased range to her guns. She, therefore, has the opposing vessel, no matter what her armament, completely in her power with the aid of only one or two of these modern implements of warfare. This is the statement which is made to me, and it seems to be rational. Would there be any difficulty in a vessel, under such circumstances, taking her own position? And if she has power to take her own position, she avoids the danger to herself, and exposes her adversary to her shot, one or two of which striking would be sufficient for the purpose of destruction. To say that vessels have always hitherto fought within pistol-shot, is to go back to the time when wind and sails were relied upon, and it is a frail argument to assume that vessels must engage now as formerly, when a new motive power has been introduced, and when velocity is not only accompanied by the ordinary superiority of one sailing vessel over another, but by the power to take a fixed relative position and retain that position. That, it seems to me, alters the whole course of naval warfare as between such vessels.

I might pause, Mr. President, to enter into many more details in reference to this, but I will only further state that I have read over a work published by Mr. Stuart, formerly an engineer in the Navy—a very beautifully illustrated work—in which he gives the dimensions, voyages, and time—the fastest, slowest, and mean time—of every frigate in the Navy; and there is not one of them that, in strength or in velocity, has approximated to the Collins line. Details are given in regard to the whole; but I am not sufficiently acquainted with the technicalities of the matter to introduce them here.

Shall I be told, then, that these men have not complied with their contract to build for you vessels suitable for purposes of war, when they have built vessels better than any which you have in your naval service? A remarkable evidence of the strength with which these vessels have been built, is, that with all the voyages they have made, including winter passages, and by the northern route, too, there has been but one of them caulked during the whole time, and that was the Atlantic, and she was found to require very little in that way. Sir, from all the information I have been able to acquire—and I have endeavored to ascertain the facts correctly—I consider that these vessels are far superior to any steam frigates that you have in your Navy, quite equal to any steam frigate in the British Navy, and superior to most of the steamers in the merchant marine of Great Britain. As regards the speed and other qualities of these vessels, I will advert briefly to some opinions of competent authorities, one of which was read by the honorable Senator from Michigan—that of Commodore Stewart, of the Navy. Another is that of Captain McKennon, of the British Navy, who certainly was not prejudiced in favor of the American steamers. He gives the unqualified opinion that the Baltic is, out and out, the fastest vessel afloat. His language is very strong, and I will read it:

"I tell them again plainly, however unpleasant to myself, that there are no ocean steamers in England comparable with the Baltic."

This is the language of a distinguished officer in the British service. Then he says:

"I am only doing justice to these magnificent vessels in stating that they are, beyond any competition, the finest, the fastest, and the best sea boats in the world. I am sorry to be obliged to say this; but, as a naval officer, I feel bound in candor to admit their great superiority."

He gives the details of his passage in the America, one of the Cunard line; he sailed in both the Baltic and America, and he states that there can be no comparison between them at all.

Again, sir, there is another high authority that touches all these questions, and that is Commander Lynch, of your own Navy. Certainly he is a man of science and capacity. Having been a passenger on one of these vessels, he writes about the Arctic:

"I examined her closely, and do, as far as I am capable of judging, consider that in strength and beauty of construction, in stability, combined with buoyancy, in dryness, and in speed, she surpasses any other vessel, national or mercantile, I have ever known; and I have three times before crossed the Atlantic by steam, and twice commanded steamers."

Will you tell me, in opposition to the authority of such high sources, that these vessels are not adapted for the purposes of war? They have strength, velocity, and capacity beyond all question. That is the opinion which is expressed by officers who are in your own service. But further, I may state a fact which is within my own knowledge, and which may be found to be so if trial is made, on the question of strength. The only objection which is made to these vessels on the score of their armament is that they have one deck more than ordinary naval steamers, and that the upper deck, which is very elevated, is not strong enough to bear an armament. Some say it cannot be sufficiently strengthened; but those acquainted with the subject say it can be strengthened for the purpose easily and readily. It will give an advantage if strengthened, so as to carry ten inch guns. Of that there can be no question, because it would give them a greater range, and with their velocity they could take their own position. As regards the walls of these vessels, they are two inches thicker than the walls of the Franklin seventy-four. But it is said that they have not strength to sustain an armament on the upper deck. The weight of a ten-inch gun is 65 70-100 weight; no more. These vessels carry in their ice-houses every trip, a solid mass of fifty tons of ice on this very deck; and yet I am told that they could not carry the ordinary armament of ten-inch guns on their upper deck, and ten thirty-two pounders on the lower deck!

Again, being without bowsprits, these vessels can, with facility, train their guns to fire from the bow; and with their velocity, with a capacity to carry even two ten-inch guns only, they would be the most formidable steamers that you could employ in your service. I have seen no sufficient authority to convince me that the upper deck of these vessels is not amply sufficient, even without additional strengthening, to carry a sufficient armament, and fire with that armament; but if we increase the strength by a few stanchions, in order to sustain the upper deck, there can be no question about it. It may be said that the mere weight of the cannon is not the difficulty. I have heard gentlemen say that one of these vessels would fall to pieces if you were to attempt to fire a gun from her. I have read the report of the answers of an officer in the British service, who was examined before a committee of the House of Commons in detail, who was a practical man, who had been previously appointed as superintendent for the purpose of making experimental practice in gunnery, and who was fully acquainted with the subject. He tells us, in his answers, that the steamers in the British commercial marine are generally from five hundred to one thousand tons burden, and no more,—this was before the Collins line was established;—that they can carry from thirty-two to sixty-eight pounders, and fire them without any risk of danger to the vessels, and that, in such vessels as those of the Cunard line, there is no difficulty whatever in carrying ten-inch guns and firing them. That is his testimony, which is given in detail. I shall not trouble the Senate with reading the whole of it; but I shall read one or two of his answers:

"J. R. Englefue called in, and further examined.

"Chairman. Have you any addition to make to the evidence you gave on a former day? Yes; one point is with reference to the weight of guns for second-class sized steam vessels."

That is the British marine service.

"I think I was not sufficiently explicit on the last occasion; that is, I merely stated that they were capable of carrying guns. I now wish to state that I think they are all capable of carrying sixty-eight-pounder guns.

"In addition to the thirty-two-pounder guns which you formerly stated they could carry on their quarter decks? Yes.

"Mr. Corry. Is that a sixty-five cwt. gun? Yes.

"Mr. Anderson. When you speak of second-class steamers, you mean second sized steamers? Yes; of from five hundred to eight hundred tons.

"From your experience and knowledge of the steam vessels in her Majesty's service, do you consider it possible to fit mercantile steamers of the same size with equal armaments? Yes, certainly.

"What further fittings would you require? would you require any additional fittings to those which have been already spoken of? No; except builtings, and places for the pivots for shifting the slides round."

Then, at the close of his deposition, he says:

"In order to show practically the facility with which merchant steamers can be armed and equipped in every way as steam frigates, I particularly invite the attention of the committee, and more particularly those of its members who are familiar with such matters, to the fact of the 'Bombay' steamer, now in the East India docks, and in every way equal in fittings to any of her Majesty's vessels, and equally efficient in every respect. This vessel has been fitted to carry two ten-inch guns, and ten medium thirty-two-pounders, and, in my opinion, could carry with ease the heavy thirty-two-pounders, or a proportionate number of sixty-eight-pounders, thereby rendering her equal, in every respect, to any of her Majesty's paddle-wheel steamers of the same tonnage. This is a case which, in my opinion, completely sets at rest any doubts as to the capabilities of our merchant steamers for war purposes. The vessel is on the spot; can be seen and surveyed by practical men. The 'Ganges' is another instance of the same sort, and can be seen at Blackwall."

Now, I venture the assertion, that neither of the vessels there mentioned approximates in speed, tonnage, strength, or capacity, for the purposes of armament, to any one of the Collins steamers. I submit, therefore, that these vessels are adapted to the purposes of war, though not able to fight broadside to broadside; and that there is not a vessel in your Navy, that, when armed with a proper crew, they could not demolish. But the honorable Senator from Florida [Mr. Mallory] tells you, as I understood his statement, that the British Government has abandoned the use of the side-wheel steamers, and converted them into propellers. With great deference to that honorable Senator's opinion, I must beg leave to doubt whether, in a single instance, the British Government has ever made such an alteration.

Mr. MALLORY. The honorable Senator mistakes the statement which I made. It was not that side-wheel steamers had been converted into propellers, but that where the alteration had been made from their sailing ships, it had been into the screw propellers; and that the paddle-wheel steamers had been condemned as war steamers.

Mr. BAYARD. I understand that perfectly; but the honorable Senator will excuse me—though he might not have intended it—and I hardly supposed at the time that he did, but I did not wish to interrupt him—he did use the expression that they had taken off their side wheels. I cannot be mistaken, for I was sitting near him at the time. He did not intend it. It was one of those slips of the tongue which will take place in the course of debate. I am perfectly aware of the fact which he states, that Great Britain has adopted the auxiliary power of steam, by means of propellers, to make some of her ordinary line-of-battle ships steamers. I am aware of all that; but it determines nothing as to the question of the relative superiority of a side-wheel steamer constructed for the purposes of war, compared with a propeller. You could not convert a line-of-battle ship into a side wheel steamer, though you might put a propeller into it. It would be impracticable from the original construction of the vessel. It is a disputed question, I admit, as to the relative merits of the two, but beyond all question the side-wheel steamer, would be inferior in an engagement broadside to broadside; I consider, however, that velocity—with modern projectiles, if there is a decided superiority on the part of the paddle-wheel steamer, which I believe there is, more than compensates for increased vulnerability. That is a matter of opinion; but still the experience of Great Britain is such that she employs them both; and in the present war, the fleets in the Baltic, and in the Black Sea, there is, as far as I have seen in the official reports—and I have paid attention to them and endeavored to ascertain—no preference expressed by any officer against the side-wheel steamer in any of the conflicts which have taken place, and they have had vessels of both kinds engaged in the operations in those seas. I admit that it is a controverted question among naval men. I admit that further experience alone can ultimately determine it; but, in my judgment, sustained by the opinion of Commodore Stewart, the element of velocity decidedly overbalances the superiority which the propeller would otherwise have, from being less vulnerable than the side-wheel steamer; and that velocity is the first requisite, in a steamer, for the purposes of war.

As regards this question of velocity, I know it has been sometimes said that the propeller might be made equal in speed to the side-wheel steamer. I have yet to see a given instance. The honorable Senator alluded to the voyage of the Himalaya to Australia. I should like to see a repetition of the voyage, and have the time, distance, the character of the sea she traverses, and the difficulties she has to encounter; for all these things must enter into the question of relative speed, and when you have found a screw steamer crossing the ocean, at all seasons of the year, by the most boisterous passage, with the speed and regularity of the Collins line, I shall be willing to admit the propeller to be of equal velocity with the side-wheel; but until you give me something approximating to that, I beg leave to entertain doubts.

I believe, sir, I have stated all that I deem necessary to vindicate my own vote. It sums up in this way: A contract was originally made by the Government, for a new enterprise, with certain citizens, at a specific sum, with a view to carry out two avowed objects on the part of the Government, to transport its mails, to prevent the entire postal service from falling into the hands of a foreign Government in time of peace, and that the vessels might be used for the purposes of war, if war should come. For the purpose of carrying out that policy, at the solicitation of an officer of Government, Collins and his associates entered into a contract. In the performance of that contract, in the prosecution of a new enterprise, they sustained losses. There were difficulties and expenditures encountered which no foresight could calculate upon. They subsequently made application to the Government, first, to advance them a portion of the sum to be subsequently repaid, and which has been repaid out of their annual allowance. Afterwards, finding that, under the competition with the British vessels, having to run a line against an established rival line, the expenditures were so great, and their losses so serious, that they could not proceed without enlarged compensation, the Government, upon looking at the whole facts of the case, granted them an additional allowance on the ground, as I suppose, that, having entered into the contract, in which the objects of the Government had been, certainly, as regards the postal service, effected, it would not allow those who had embarked their capital to carry it out, to become losers under the technical operation of the contract. That additional allowance contained a proviso that Congress might, after a certain period, terminate it. They now apply to have that uncertainty removed, because they have experienced, and you have experienced, that a capricious exercise of the power may be made, at any moment, when there is not more than a quorum of either House present. Under these circumstances, deeming that it would be more equitable and just, and better serve the objects intended to be accomplished—believing that, in point of fact, these men have carried out, without regard to expense, their contract with the Government, in its essential particulars of constructing vessels of the proper kind, and performing the terms of the contract in the transportation of the mails, I feel myself justified in voting for the bill of the House, which will prevent the question from ever again coming before Congress, until the contract terminates.

Mr. PETTIT. Mr. President, I vote for the House bill—

First. Because it encourages American shipbuilding, and this is necessary.

Second. It encourages a spirit of enterprise in commerce among our fellow-citizens.

Third. The ships rival England in steamship navigation of the ocean; and this is a subject of great and just pride to our citizens.

Fourth. It is due to our national character to carry our mails abroad.

Fifth. It is due to Collins & Co. from the past implied, if not explicit, intention of Congress.

Sixth. It will furnish a strong, efficient, and reliable arm of defense in time of war.

Seventh. It is the cheapest way of raising and maintaining a Navy, to increase which is my ardent desire.

I shall not detain the Senate by elaborating each of these positions.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. Weller.) The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. Chase.]

Mr. PETTIT called for the yeas and nays; and they were ordered.

Mr. BELL. I have paired off with the Senator from Arkansas, [Mr. Johnson.] As he is not in his place, he requested me to consider the engagement of last night as still standing. I should vote "no," and he would vote "aye."

Mr. DODGE, of Wisconsin. I have paired off with the honorable Senator from Maine, [Mr. Hamlin.]

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Butler, Chase, Clay, Dawson, Evans, Fitzpatrick, Geyer, Hunter, Jones of Tennessee, Mallory, Sebastian, Slidell, Toombs, Toucey, and Wells—16.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Badger, Bayard, Benjamin, Brainerd, Bright, Brodhead, Brown, Cass, Clayton, Cooper, Douglas, Foot, Gillette, Gwin, James, Jones of Iowa, Mason, Pearce, Pettit, Pratt, Rusk, Seward, Shields, Stuart, Thompson of Kentucky, Thomson of New Jersey, Walker, Weller, and Wright—30.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I take it for granted that the minds of Senators are entirely made up on this question, and although I should like to submit some remarks in reply to what has been said, I forbear to do so. I content myself with offering the amendment which I withdrew yesterday, to strike out the provision in the bill taking away the power to give notice, and in lieu of it, to insert:

And that the Secretary of the Navy is hereby directed to give the notice provided in the first section of the act entitled "An act to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the fiscal year, ending the 30th of June, 1852," approved the 21st day of July, 1852, to terminate the arrangement for the additional allowance for the transportation of the United States mail between Liverpool and New York in the Collins line of steamers, as therein provided.

Mr. ADAMS called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered; and being taken, are as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Butler, Chase, Clay, Dawson, Douglas, Evans, Fitzpatrick, Hunter, Jones of Tennessee, Mallory, Mason, Sebastian, Slidell, Toombs, Wells, and Wilson—17.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Badger, Bayard, Benjamin, Brainerd, Brodhead, Brown, Cass, Clayton, Cooper, Fessenden, Foot, Gillette, Gwin, James, Jones of Iowa, Pettit, Pratt, Rusk, Seward, Stuart, Sumner, Thompson of Kentucky, Thomson of New Jersey, Toucey, Walker, Weller, and Wright—29.

So the amendment was rejected.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment.

Mr. HUNTER. I renew the amendment of the Committee on Finance, to strike out the clause which takes away the power to give notice, and on that question I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 24, nays 25; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Brodhead, Brown, Butler, Cass, Chase, Clay, Dawson, Evans, Fitzpatrick, Hunter, Jones of Tennessee, Mallory, Mason, Morton, Pearce, Pratt, Sebastian, Slidell, Toombs, Toucey, Wade, Wells, and Wilson—24.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Badger, Bayard, Benjamin, Brainerd, Bright, Clayton, Cooper, Douglas, Foot, Gillette, Gwin, James, Jones of Iowa, Pettit, Rusk, Seward, Shields, Stuart, Sumner, Thompson of Kentucky, Thomson of New Jersey, Walker, Weller, and Wright—25.

Mr. PEARCE. I move to amend the clause, by adding at the end of it:

Provided, That the proprietors of said line shall agree to such a modification of their existing contract as shall stipulate for the payment, for the residue of the term limited in the original contract, after the 31st day of December, 1855, of $25,000 per trip, instead of $33,000 which they now receive, and the Postmaster General is hereby directed to make such modification of the contract.

Mr. President, I will state, very briefly, the reasons which induce me to offer this amendment. I have thought that the allowance made to the proprietors of this line was too large, while I have also thought the allowance made by the original contract was too small. The original contract provided for $385,000 a year for twenty trips. By the act of 1852 we added six to the number of trips, an increase of thirty per centum in the service; but considering that those trips were, for the most part at all events, to be performed during the stormy, wintry months, it seemed to me that it would be right to estimate the service at rather more than thirty per centum. As the service was required to be performed at a season more than usually stormy and inclement, I was willing to add to the $385,000, stipulated in the original contract, thirty-three and a third per centum for the additional trips, which would have been about $513,000. But the ships which they constructed were much larger and of greater power and speed than those which they originally proposed. The increase of size may be estimated at fifty per centum above the estimation of the original contract.

Now, I do not propose to add fifty per centum increase to the amount allowed for the performance of the service, because, without doubt, a part of the expense which they have thus sustained must have been incurred in the spirit of commercial speculation, with the view of an increased amount of passage money and freight. I think it is right to allow them something for the increased tonnage, speed, and power of the vessels, as being a benefit to the mail service; but I do not think it is proper to allow them the whole. I propose, therefore, by this amendment, to give them $650,000 a year, which, I think, would include a liberal addition to the $513,000, to which they would be entitled if we were to increase the original contract price by thirty-three and a third per centum for the amount of additional service which we have required. I do not care to inquire whether the investment of the company has been successful, and, of course, not to examine the amounts of expenditures and receipts; for the taking of this contract to carry the ocean mails does not require the Government to guarantee the success and profit of a scheme which, in its origin, looked quite as much to the returns of freight and passage money as to the compensation for carrying the mails. Neither do I think that this Government can properly undertake to sustain the company against the rivalry of foreign competition, however much our public spirit and national pride may be interested in the triumph of American skill, in the building and management of these fine ships.

But, sir, I shall say no more, as I find the Senate is not in a condition to hear, and I speak to unwilling ears. When no order is kept, I will not speak.

[During the taking of the last vote there was great interest manifested to ascertain the result, and the closeness of the vote led to much speculation in an under tone throughout the Chamber. This was the disorder to which Mr. Pearce alluded.]

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is too much noise in the Chamber. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Maryland.

Mr. BADGER called for the yeas and nays; and they were ordered.

Mr. PRATT. Mr. President, I do not know that I precisely understand the amendment of my colleague; and I rise as much for the purpose of getting information, which I desire to govern my vote, as for any other purpose. The proposition of my colleague seems to me to be obnoxious to the objection which existed to the proposition of the Senator from Ohio. The bill is a bill making an appropriation of money due to these persons for antecedent services. I looked, therefore, on the amendment of the Senator from Ohio—which made it a condition to the receipt of money already due to these persons that they should assent to any modification of the contract—as a violation of the contract itself. Now, it appears to me that the amendment which is offered by my colleague is obnoxious to the same objection. If I am correctly informed—and, if I am not, I want information from any source—we owe these parties for two years' mail service; and the primary object of this bill is to pay the debt which we owe. I apprehend that, on a bill which is intended simply to pay what we owe, you cannot properly impose a condition that they shall not be paid unless they consent to a modification of the contract. I agree with my colleague, that the compensation which they receive is, perhaps, larger than it ought to be. I am perfectly willing to modify it, if we can in good faith do so. According to my conception, however, we have no right to say to these persons, "we will pay you the money which we owe you, provided you will agree to take less than the sum which, under the existing contract, you have a right to receive." That is the difficulty which I have in sustaining the proposition of my colleague.

Mr. PEARCE. I have entirely misconceived the bill if such be its effect. I understand that the appropriation contained in the clause to which I have moved this amendment, is an appropriation of $858,000 for the fiscal year ending the 30th day of June, 1856.

Mr. PRATT. Is it not for the last year?

Mr. PEARCE. No, sir; but as I read the section it contains an appropriation for the next fiscal year. Certainly I should not offer any proposition requiring the parties to enter into an arrangement of this sort, as an amendment to a section providing for payment for services already due. I do not so understand it. The section is, I believe, for payment of the sum which, under the existing contract, they will be entitled to during the course of the next fiscal year. I can only satisfy myself thoroughly about it by examining the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Maryland.

Mr. PEARCE. I beg leave to say now that I am satisfied, from what I am informed by the clerk of the Committee on Finance, that I am right. My amendment is to the first section of the bill, which provides for the next fiscal year. The third section of the bill provides for the deficiencies of last year. The objection of my colleague, therefore, does not apply to this case.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 23, nays 25; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Bright, Brown, Butler, Chase, Clay, Dawson, Evans, Fitzpatrick, Geyer, Hunter, Johnson, Jones of Tennessee, Mallory, Mason, Morton, Pearce, Sebastian, Slidell, Thompson of Kentucky, Toombs, Toucey, and Wells—23.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Badger, Bayard, Benjamin, Brodhead, Cass, Clayton, Cooper, Fessenden, Foot, Gillette, Gwin, James, Jones of Iowa, Pettit, Rusk, Seward, Shields, Stuart, Sumner, Thomson of New Jersey, Wade, Waller, Wilson, and Wright—25.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. President, there was a misapprehension at the time the vote was taken on the proposition of the chairman of the Committee on Finance to strike out the clause in the bill as it comes from the House, which takes away the power to give the notice. The vote on that motion stood twenty-four to twenty-five. I voted among the twenty-five. There was a misapprehension on the part of my honorable friend from Missouri, [Mr. GEYER,] who supposed that he and I had paired off on that question. I now desire to give him a full opportunity of recording his vote. I move to reconsider the vote by which that amendment was rejected, in order to give him a chance to do so. I hold myself bound in honor to give him an opportunity to record his vote, under those circumstances. I move to reconsider the vote by which that amendment was rejected.

Mr. TOOMBS called for the yeas and nays; and they were ordered.

Mr. CLAYTON. Having made the motion to reconsider, I wish to state that I shall vote precisely as I have done heretofore. I have made the motion, because I desire to give my friend from Missouri [Mr. GEYER] an opportunity to record his vote in favor of the reconsideration. It will be observed that, if we had both voted, the result would not have been effected in any way. Still, he is entitled to have his vote recorded on the question, as I think; and now, having said that much on that part of the subject, allow me to add a few words in regard to the proposition itself.

Mr. President, I have not troubled the Senate with a word before on this question. I have desired to listen, and not to speak, and although I have regarded this as a very important question, I shall not now detain the Senate for many minutes. I look upon this as a question deeply affecting the commercial interests of this country. We are in the midst of a struggle, which has been raging since the commencement of the year 1850, with the greatest maritime Power on earth for the supremacy of the seas. That contest commenced at the time the British Government passed a law repealing the navigation laws of that country, which had stood for two hundred years, and which were regarded as the bulwark of the maritime superiority of Great Britain. No entreaties, no implorations of our countrymen could induce them to change their position on that subject; but on the occasion to which I have alluded, influenced by considerations which I am not now at liberty to enter into, owing to the shortness of time which I feel ought to be allotted to me, they challenged the United States to a competition on the principles of what was called freedom of trade, by opening their own ports for the indirect trade, on condition that we should open ours. Thus the carrying trade became the subject of rivalry—the prize offered to victory in the contest between these two great nations.

At the time the proposition was made by Great Britain, I was one of those who advised that this Government should enter into the competition without hesitation or delay. A distinguished gentleman, [Mr. Webster,] who had preceded me in the office which I then held, had given an opinion that, under the act of the 3d of March, 1817, the British proposition could not be accepted without the consent of Congress. To have asked the consent of Congress at that time, would have been equivalent to rejecting the proposition. We acceded to the proposition as it stood, construing the act of 1817 as giving us the power, and we hazarded everything on the result. My anticipations of that day have been fully realized. Owing to the influence of our own republican institutions, the character of our seamen and merchants—all the latter deriving their consideration from the former—we have beaten Great Britain in the carrying trade. The result has been, that in five years during which the competition has existed, we have progressed so far that, instead of being the second commercial nation in the world, we are now the first. Our commercial tonnage, at this time, exceeds that of Great Britain herself.

Sir, this struggle is still raging. It is one of the greatest of all the contests that ever existed between contending nations. We rely upon our republican institutions; Great Britain relies on her peculiar institutions; and the question is, which shall evince their superiority? Under such circumstances, for the honor of the country, when not only its prosperity, but its glory, depends upon that struggle, I am not willing to be behind Great Britain in anything which shall tend to put my own countrymen on terms of full and complete equality with her.

The question now before the Senate has bearings and relations far beyond the topics which have been introduced into the debate. The question is, shall we carry on this contest by the aid of British steamers conveying the mail; or shall we, on the other hand, see to it that the mail is carried in American bottoms as ancillary to the exertions of our seamen and merchants, and vindicate our superiority as well in those steamships as we do in the sailing vessels of the ocean? I look on the intelligence which is brought to this country by our steamers as absolutely necessary for the success of our commerce, as necessary to our complete success in that contest to which I have pointed the attention of the Senate. So looking on this question, I am willing to make some and great sacrifices in order to sustain my own countrymen in the struggle. I believe, from the best information I can get, that the expense of the Canard steamers to the British Government has been greater than the expense of the Collins steamers to this Government. But I do not intend to regard the expenditure of a few thousands of dollars when that sum is necessary to be expended to sustain the highest interests of the country.

Mr. President, I do not enter at large into the debate in which other gentlemen have freely indulged in regard to how much benefit we have received, or how much Congress has conferred upon the Collins line of steamers. That part of the subject has been fully discussed by others; but I desire to suggest that in accepting the British proposition we reserve to ourselves exclusive and important privileges and rights for our own commerce which they did not reserve for theirs. They gave up the registry law of their own country. They gave up the exclusive right to build their own ships. Any people in the world may now build ships for them. It is not so here. Our ship builders retain a complete monopoly over ship building, and that great manufacturing interest is protected to the extent of utter prohibition. So it is in regard to the coast-wise trade. We have not suffered others to compete with us in our coasting trade though Great Britain has yielded us the right to participate in her colonial and intercolonial trade. These may be justly deemed as great sacrifices made by us to give the advantage to our commercial marine. I do not propose to consider the question whether these prohibitions ought to be continued, but by referring to these facts I desire to show that you have made much greater sacrifices, in order to sustain your commercial marine, than you are now called upon to make by voting this sum out of the Treasury for sustaining the Collins line of steamers.

Mr. President, the eyes of the world are now directed to Great Britain and the United States. If we gain the advantage in the contest, as we think we have done already, it can be attributed to nothing but the superiority of our republican institutions over the institutions of Great Britain. Our success will vindicate our claim to the superiority of our institutions, as compared with this. I would not, for any consideration like that of the sum of money which has been voted for the Collins line of steamers, hazard our success in any degree. I would not agree that Great Britain should keep the post office for us, or carry all our mails. I would not lose the benefit of the intelligence which we receive so much the more speedily by these Collins vessels, than by hers.

I forbear to discuss the question whether the propositions of others are likely to be more advantageous to us, if accepted, than those of the Collins line, solely because that subject has been so fully and ably considered by others, and especially by my colleague. Satisfied that we ought not to hazard the loss of the benefits which the whole commercial and business community derive from this line by abandoning a certainty for an uncertainty, I shall cheerfully give my vote to sustain the Collins line. As to the retention of the power to give the notice to abandon the contract, which the amendment of the House relinquishes, it has been shown by others that the only effect of such a power has been, and will be hereafter, to harass the contractors with constant alarms and apprehensions essentially retarding the efforts, and paralyzing the energies of the contractors.

Mr. TOOMBS. Mr. President, the discussion having been reopened, and the time of the Senate repeatedly occupied this morning by the friends of the measure sent to us by the House, I shall avail myself of my privilege to make a few remarks in reply to the Senator from Delaware, [Mr. CLAYTON.]

Nothing has satisfied me that this whole proposition is without an argument to support it, more than the ability and ingenuity which have been attempted without producing one. The gentleman from Delaware says, in the first place, that this is a question as to the superiority of American shipping over British. Well, sir, what is the question? The very eminent and distinguished Senator from Delaware says that is it. I conceive it to be entirely different. You made a contract in 1852, by which you gave these men hundreds of thousands of dollars as additional compensation, and you only retained the same right over it which you have over every contract for the transportation of the mails, by sea and land. You have provided, what is provided in regard to every mail contract in America, that it may be rescinded. The question now is, whether you shall give up that power. It is not a question of gratification to the friends of liberty in Europe, as the Senator from Delaware supposes, to see whether the Collins ships shall get in ten minutes before Cunard's. This is the idlest of all the pretenses by which it is attempted to deprive the Government of a substantial right, without a consideration. Nobody has offered one. Are you going to give an advantage to American shipping in this country by conferring the greatest monopoly that ever has been seen since the Revolution to this day? Is that the way to build up our institutions? Is that the way we have succeeded? Is it by going back for centuries to all the restrictions, to all the monopolies, which disgraced and retarded mankind for five centuries? That is what the gentleman says it is. You are going to build up an American marine, and you are going to make it compete at home and abroad with all the world, by giving a monopoly here!

Sir, the question before us is not even a question of monopoly, on which the gentleman puts it, and if it were, I should oppose it. The question is, whether the American Senate and House of Representatives will give up a wise restriction which they placed on this contract, that they might, on giving six months' notice, reduce the additional compensation, if, in the judgment of the two Houses on the information before them, it should be proper to do so. Why do you say that those who are to come after you shall not have this power, which is provided for everywhere in all the mail contracts of the United States, and in every little act of incorporation? Why, sir, only the other day when a bill was pending to allow the people of Georgetown the privilege of subscribing to the stock of a railroad company in this District, the American Senate, nem. con., voted that they would not allow that act to pass without a right being reserved to repeal it whenever Congress should think proper. It is done every day. In every contract for carrying the mail in the United States, this right is reserved. In regard to every steamboat, railroad, horse-mail, foot-mail, every mail-carrier, and penny-post in the United States, the right is reserved to take away the contract when you want to do it. It is a just and wise provision. Why should a majority attempt to do away with that right here and maintain it in all other cases? Why should there be an exception here? Is it proper to build up American navigation by giving to these people a benefit which is conferred upon nobody else? You have imposed on them that condition to which every one else, doing similar service, is subjected, and now it is proposed to take it away.

I would take away the whole contract, for I have opposed it for ten years, but I have never succeeded, and do not expect to succeed. I have never supposed that I could succeed in resisting it. I have not supposed, and I do not suppose, that a job of this character can be resisted under this Government. I have a duty to perform, however, and I intend to perform it. I will resist what I believe to be injurious to the Commonwealth. I will resist what I believe to be unjust. The consequences are with those who have equal power, equal rights, equal duties. I have nothing to say to those who differ from me on this question; but it being, in my judgment, injurious to the public service to take away a power which, I consider, may be important; I cannot consent to it. It may be very important for many reasons, in maintaining the very competition of which the Senator from Delaware has spoken. Why should you give an unlimited, boundless confidence to Collins that you give to nobody else? Suppose, after you give it to him, he will not carry on the rivalry, where are you then? There is no condition in the bond that Cunard shall not be allowed to beat him. The very pretences which you urge are shown not to be true on the face of the contract. Have you any condition that Collins shall beat the Cunarders? Though you give him a large amount of money, there is no provision in the contract that he shall run over the ocean even in thirty days. You bind him with no conditions. You have bound everybody else. You bind every man who contracts with the Post Office Department, except E. K. Collins & Co. Why? The country will ask the reason.

Again, sir, the Senator from Delaware has said, that if the Collins line succeeds, it will prove the superiority of republican Government over monarchy. Mr. President, with great deference to the Senator from Delaware, I must say that there are some statements, I will not call them arguments, as unanswerable from their absurdity as from their reasoning.

Mr. CLAYTON. I think the honorable gentleman has mistaken my view.

Mr. TOOMBS. No, sir; I took down the Senator's language.

Mr. CLAYTON. What I said was that the success of the American mercantile marine, in the great struggle going on with England since 1850, in virtue of the arrangement made at that time between the two countries, would be, and I endeavored to demonstrate that it would be, a vindication of our own institutions. On that question I am perfectly willing to meet the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. TOOMBS. The British Government have never pressed any such race. They get double the service that we do for the same money that we pay. It is not considered to be a very great advantage to a man if he ties both hands behind him; but that is our position on this question. The British Government get a weekly mail service for the same sum of money for which we get a semi-monthly one. That is under an extravagant monarchy, which we have attempted to get rid of. Why, sir, we have made it the pride of our republican Government, that every man in this country is equal. We have boasted that we have no titles, no monopolies, no bounties, but that every man was free to follow the bent of his own genius as he pleased; that he asked no aid from the Government; that he wished no protection, but simply desired to be let alone. We have said that monarchies give exclusive privileges, exclusive orders, monopolies, restrictions, and bounties, so that they grind labor for the benefit of favorites. Now we are to imitate them in that race; here, to-day, in the American Senate, we are called upon to do it.

We, sir, are giving Mr. Collins twice as much money as England gives Cunard, and it is said that the whole honor of the American nation is concerned in Collins beating Cunard. That is the argument of the Senator from Delaware. No man can dispute that that is the only ground upon which we are called to do this; and yet Cunard performs fifty-two trips a year for less mo. than Collins does twenty-six. That is the official statement. I know I have heard it whispered about in the lobbies outside, that there is a great deal of money given by the British Government which nobody ever hears of; but, sir, the responsibility of the institutions of Great Britain is as perfect and accurate, and much more so, than our own. No dollar is ever voted out of their Treasury but by act of Parliament. The proceedings of Parliament are public; they are known; and if the Cunard line get any other money than that which is voted for them, it is surreptitiously got. It may be given by patriotic Englishmen out of their own pockets. If patriotic American Senators wish to imitate the example, and take money out of their own pockets, and not go to the Treasury of the Union for the purpose of benefiting Mr. Collins, though I might condemn the act, I should not allude to it, for it would not concern me, as a public man here. What they give is by law; and all the talk of their giving more is for the purpose of deluding and deceiving those who wish to be deluded and deceived—who want pretexts and excuses to do what cannot be vindicated in any argument for the public interests.

Now, sir, I do not think that the proper way to promote American navigation is to give a monopoly to one company, and to provide effectually that nobody else shall run a steamship to Great Britain. I consider the navigation laws, to which the Senator from Delaware has referred, as bad laws; and I believe he does; but under them we retain a rivalry amongst our own countrymen. Here he is taking away that rivalry, and giving to one company $858,000 a year advantage over anybody else who wishes to enter into this race with the British. Patriotism is a very excellent thing when well applied; but I do not think that is the proper way to show it. I have heard a great deal said about British rivalry. I take it that that is an expression used by many honorable gentlemen who have no better argument. When these vessels cannot beat each other in a fair race, but it requires us to pay our vessels double the amount of money which the British Government pay theirs, simply for the advantage of five or ten hours in a trip, I feel that the race has lost all reasons for rejoicing in my mind. I believe it is a rule with racers that, if they run together in an even race, it is a fair business; but if you give your man twice as much money in a mere physical matter which money can command, and you are satisfied with that triumph over the British, I am not. But, sir, the Senator from Delaware imagines that the friends of liberty all over Europe are looking at the expedition of the Collins line over the Cunarders.

Mr. CLAYTON. Not at all.

Mr. TOOMBS. Did not the gentleman say that the friends of liberty in Europe looked to these ships?

Mr. CLAYTON. I referred to the struggle between the two countries, undoubtedly—not in regard to this line particularly, but to the contest which was going on under the arrangement of 1850, for the indirect trade of the world.

Mr. TOOMBS. When you get up the contest for the indirect trade of the world, and open the struggle to everybody, I am with you; but I do not think the proper way to accomplish that is to give a monopoly to the Collins line. I understood the gentleman to say, that the friends of liberty in Europe looked to the speed of these ships. I am perfectly willing, however, to take his explanation in his own words. I know how apt I am to misunderstand others, and to be misunderstood myself; and therefore I take the gentleman's words to be exactly as he states them. Then he says, the friends of liberty in Europe are looking with interest to the struggle between America and England for the trade of the world. Sir, I am willing to go as far as he who furthest goes on that point. In my judgment no policy would be more injurious to the attainment of that result than the one which I have heard advocated by the Senator from Delaware. Sir, I would command the high roads of this continent, but I would not go in copartnership with the British for them. I would take a different mode, and I would command what I could get from the independent sovereignties of this continent, fairly, without sharing it with England, or any other foreign Power.

But how ridiculous is the idea that the whole question of the superiority of American commerce, to which foreigners are now looking with so much interest, is to turn upon whether this Congress shall surrender its power over the Collins line or not. We have the power now to take away a certain portion of their contract, and before God and the country I say that the only question is, whether we shall surrender that power which it is our duty to keep? You may talk about it as much as you please, you may rave about it as much as you please, but that is the real question.

The argument of last night is now abandoned; and I am glad that it is. We were then told that the reservation of this power disturbs legislation, that it controls other measures, that perhaps it has had a bad influence on our action. Now, the argument is returning to the naked question, shall we take away from the United States, whom we represent, the power to discontinue the present extravagant compensation if, in the judgment of the honorable men who are to succeed us for the next five years, the owners of this line are not carrying out the contract, and are not maintaining American superiority with fidelity? Shall we at once surrender all the control of the Congress of the United States over this matter, which was reserved by solemn contract when we paid $500,000, and threw it into the hands of E. K. Collins and company? This proposition is not to reduce the pay, to do nothing except to take from the Congress of the United States the power which they now have, of terminating this contract, if, in their judgment, it shall not be faithfully carried out.

The gentleman from Delaware cannot show one reason in the contract for what he has stated. There is no obligation in the contract requiring Collins & Co. to beat the British. That is not in the bond. There is no such stipulation. We are to trust to this company to vindicate the national honor and the national marine, and we are to take away from the American Congress the power to judge independently whether they have or have not done it, and to withdraw the extra compensation. That is the whole question. It is magnified into national honor, national glory, and patriotism; but all these are appeals to the follies of mankind when there is no reason to offer upon so plain and direct a proposition.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. President, I certainly do not design to answer that part of the speech of the honorable gentleman from Georgia, which repeated what was stated so often in the debate before, and which was so well and ably answered before I said one word in regard to this measure. The questions he has touched had been sufficiently discussed; and when I rose it was for the purpose of presenting my own peculiar view of the subject, and to say what I believed, that at this time the rivalry between the commercial marine of Great Britain and that of the United States in consequence of President Taylor's acceptance of the British proposition made in 1849, for the free navigation in the indirect trade, was now attracting the attention of the world; that it was a mighty struggle, and I thought it was easily demonstrable that our superiority was owing to our institutions. That superiority has been vindicated since the struggle commenced on the 1st January 1850, and is shown by the fact that we now have more tonnage than Great Britain herself, although, before the freedom of navigation conceded by her repeal of her navigation laws in 1849, she was far ahead of us in this particular. I thought this great consideration was worthy of being taken into view at this time, when we were about to vote on this bill. I said that this measure of protection to the Collins steamers was ancillary to the great American interests in that controversy. I think so still. Nothing which has been said by the honorable Senator from Georgia has induced me to doubt it. Our commercial men gain more speedily and surely commercial information by this means than by any other. I said also that I was unwilling to trust the whole of the mails between Europe and this country in British hands; that I desired it to be in American hands, and that we should compete successfully with them, and beat them with steamers on the ocean as we had done with sailing vessels.

The honorable Senator, who has entirely misconceived and misrepresented my remarks, has dwelt on the stale charge against the Collins line, that it is a monopoly. Why, sir, would he abolish this and every other line established on the same principle; would he permit Great Britain, which has created—what he calls a monopoly—a monopoly in her behalf, by building up the Cunard steamers, and sustaining them constantly by large drafts from her Treasury; would he permit her alone, without competition, to navigate the ocean, and carry the mail for us between Great Britain and this country? I think the Senator from Georgia, himself, on calm reflection, would not agree to that; but he repeats the cry, raised by himself and by others who spoke before him, that this is a monopoly. How? Because we do not give the same sum of money, and the same inducement to others. Monopoly? Why, sir, we must first build up one line that will, at least, compete with the British monopoly; and the question now is, shall the British have the monopoly entirely confined to themselves. That is the true question which is presented to the Senate. When the British Government shall choose to abandon their monopoly, we shall cheerfully agree to leave the competition open to all, or refuse to sustain any one line of steamers in preference to others. He might as well at present raise the cry of monopoly against our Navy, because the privilege of building men-of-war is not equally encouraged by the Government, whether men, with or without skill in naval architecture, undertake to build them for us.

Mr. President, I certainly did not intend to say, and I know I did not say, that the question of the superiority of our republican institutions depended upon the Collins line of steamers, although the Senator from Georgia has chosen to put those words in my mouth, and to reply to them; but I did say, and I verily believe, and I think any man who will reflect on the subject will concur with me, that the reason why, since Great Britain challenged us to a trial upon the ocean for the indirect trade of the world, we have beaten them in that trial as we never did beat them before, on account of their restrictions upon navigation, is to be found entirely in our republican institutions. I thought so at the time President Taylor agreed to open the ports of the United States to Great Britain, and accept her challenge, and for that reason I advised him to do it. I have been confirmed in it since. What gives us our superiority? Sir, the American captain feels that he is a free man in his own country, and the American merchant feels that he also is a man equal to any here of the same merits in other respects. There is no caste here, thank God! there is no degradation from caste; there is no elevation from titles of nobility; there is no aristocracy here. When the British captain goes into the counting-house of the British merchant, he goes with his hat under his arm, and often looks like a free negro on a Saturday afternoon, in a country store, humbled at the presence of one superior to himself. When the British merchant meets my lord the duke, or my lord the marquis, or the earl, in the street, he doffs his beaver; he is below him; he feels that he is inferior, and there is no equality between them, and there never can exist any equality under their institutions.

But here, sir, the American sailor, the American captain, and the American merchant feels as deep an interest in society as any men among us. It is owing to the republican institutions of our country that the American proves a superior to the British captain when he takes command of a ship. It is owing to the character which our republican institutions confer upon all the men who are engaged in our mercantile marine, and owing to that alone, that the American ship is always in better order and neater trim, and always makes her voyage in a shorter time than the British. It is owing to this that there is more energy displayed by the American who does not, as those on the other side of the water do, often lay-to for a day or two, and go to sleep, while the American, impelled by every consideration which can make life desirable and happy, carries all the sail he can on the voyage, and is never known to strike a topsail while a mast will carry it.

Sir, I know that the patience of the Senate will not allow me now to go at length into this subject; but I say again to the Senator from Georgia, that I attribute the whole superiority which we have exhibited in this great struggle, to this consideration. The world, I think, will inquire why it is that, after the year 1850, when the commercial intercourse between the two nations was fully opened, and all the restrictions on indirect trade between the two countries were taken off, the American marine went ahead of the British, so that our commercial tonnage now exceeds theirs by more than a hundred thousand tons. Why is it, everybody will ask, and all will be compelled to make the answer, and they can make no other true answer than the one which I have given. Is this not, then, a glorious triumph for our republican institutions?

I have said that I spoke of the performance of the Collins line in this mighty contest as ancillary to our whole commercial system; and I put it to the honorable Senator, can he not see, and does he not feel that the maintenance of this line is immensely important to us in this view? Our commercial men engaged in this commerce now so deeply, want intelligence at the shortest possible moment, to enable them to maintain the competition. The Senator says the Collins line are not bound to give it to us by their contract, but they have given it to us; and in the fact that they have heretofore given it to us without being bound to do so, we have the best guarantee in the world that they will give it again. I do not entertain any doubt upon the subject. If he does, he may be justifiable in the vote which he gives; but having some acquaintance with the men, I have full confidence that the same pride which has stimulated them heretofore to give us the superiority in speed, will induce them to continue it; and there are not wanting sufficient motives of interest to impel them to the same course. They will feel that when their contract is terminated, if they perform it well, they will be entitled to a favorable consideration from this Government hereafter. They know that they will have forfeited their own self-respect, as well as the respect of Congress, and of this Government, if they fail. They know well the great motives of interest which led us to adopt the course we have taken, and I therefore repeat that I have confidence that we shall have all the benefits we have enjoyed, and even still greater if this bill passes.

Would the Senator from Georgia, would any other Senator, feel willing now, if there should be a sudden outbreak against us on the part of any European Power, that the whole mail between Europe and the United States should be in the hands of a monopoly, as he calls it, supported by Great Britain? Does the honorable gentleman expect private individuals in this country, without aid from their own Government, to maintain a rivalry with the Cunard line? No one, I venture to say, entertains such an idea; no one can imagine it for a moment. The private fortunes of no gentlemen in this country would permit them to enter successfully into, and maintain, such a rivalry as that. And the question recurs, are you willing now, while there may be at any moment an interruption of the pacific relations between this country and some European nation, to allow all the mail carriage between Europe and the United States to be in foreign hands—in the hands of British monopolists, if you choose to call them so? I would not. The British Government has shown heretofore that it has no hesitation whatever in putting its hands into the British Post Office to read, or even to stop, intelligence which it did not desire to be conveyed, connected with the foreign relations of that country. It has even arrested foreign correspondence. I am not willing to trust to it alone again. No, sir. If a British fleet, or a fleet from any other country, were to start from the shores of Europe, I want the Collins line to bring the intelligence that it is bound here, and that it is expected to attack us. If such a possible case as that should occur, I want an American ship to bring the intelligence; I want men who have American hearts in their bosoms, and who feel as I do, and as I am sure the honorable Senator from Georgia himself does, to have control of the ship that brings it.

I thought it proper to offer these few remarks, because I made the motion to reconsider. Let me say to gentlemen who voted as I did upon the question that I have been impelled to make that motion by a consideration which I cannot resist. My honorable friend from Missouri believed that he had paired off with me. Under such circumstances, it is no question with me whether a contract was really entered into between me and him, but I intend to give him the privilege of recording his vote on this motion, in justice to him, and having done that, I shall vote against the reconsideration in justice to myself.

Mr. GEYER. Mr. President, I rise to make my acknowledgments to my friend from Delaware for affording me an opportunity of recording my vote on this question, in which I have taken much interest. This morning I thought I had paired off with him. I knew myself to be too unwell to remain in the Chamber during the day, and I left it for a few minutes under the impression that I had paired off with him, intending to go to my lodgings. Before I left the building, however, I was informed that the vote had been taken, to my surprise, because I had no anticipation that it would be brought up at so early a moment. Coming into the Chamber I learned that the Senator from Delaware cast his vote, under the impression which was, no doubt, made on his mind, that he had not paired off with me. I had made the application, and I interpreted his answer according to my request. I regret very much that in this indulgence afforded to me, the time of the Senate, so very important at this period of the session, should be occupied; and I will not abuse it longer by entering into this debate. I cannot forbear, however, to bring the honorable Senator from Delaware back to the question.

The question is not whether we shall discontinue the effort to outstrip the Canadians, but whether we shall pursue in our own hands, by reserving the power to put an end to the contract, the certainty, if it is in the power of these contractors, to maintain the speed at which they have run their vessels. The additional compensation was voted to the Collins line, in 1852, because of their extraordinary performances. We voted them $16,800 per trip more than would have been necessary in order to maintain the speed of the Cunarders. Now, sir, after having voted the money, and having exacted from them terms by which we compel them to maintain the speed, it is proposed that we shall abandon all the security which we have reserved to ourselves for the performance of their engagements.

The honorable Senator from Delaware, in one view of the subject, states the question properly. We are now proposing to place annually in the hands of these contractors $858,000, relying exclusively on their pride, having no other security; for they are not bound to maintain their speed by any contract into which they have entered. They do maintain it only because the $858,000 annually depend upon their performing the service for which that compensation was contemplated. Now let us see how interest will operate against pride.

Sir, it is said by Mr. Collins himself that the cost of the superior speed of the Collins over the Cunard line is $16,800 the voyage in and out, and the difference between making New York instead of Boston the end of the voyage, costs the Collins line $9,810. We have voted, and cannot now get rid of it, a bounty, a discrimination in favor of New York against Boston of $9,810 multiplied twenty-six times in the year. That we cannot get rid of, nor can the owners of the Collins line, for they must make New York their terminus. But, sir, reject the amendment proposed by the Committee on Finance, and then where is your security? You present a temptation for them not to excel the Cunard time, to the amount of $16,800 per trip, or $436,800 per annum. Whenever you withdraw your power to coerce the performance of the speed which is required now, and has been performed heretofore, you present an interest equal to $436,800 per annum to weigh against the pride of beating the Cunarders, and in the five years it amounts to $2,184,000.

Now I put it to the honorable Senator from Delaware, whether, in his private transactions, he would be willing to entrust an amount of money equal to that, in the hands of any man, or present a temptation to him, relying exclusively upon his pride to fulfill his engagements. Sir, I think I hazard nothing in predicting, that while Mr. Collins may have an interest in this line, something like a show of the performance heretofore, will be kept up; but it may pass into other hands, and I do not want to present, even to him, the temptation of $436,800 a year to violate what we have a right to insist upon under the appropriation of 1852, as part of our contract according to the terms of that act. I should be perfectly willing to repeal that proviso if stipulations were required that would compel them to perform the service in the time which Congress had in view when that appropriation was voted. Until that is done I cannot consent that they shall be trusted to the whole amount of the appropriation annually, and rely exclusively on their pride.

Mr. PEARCE. I wish simply to state, that on this question I have paired off with the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. Foot.]

The question being taken by yeas and nays upon the motion to reconsider the vote rejecting the amendment of the Committee on Finance, resulted—yeas 24, nays 24; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Brodhead, Brown, Butler, Cass, Chase, Clay, Dawson, Evans, Fitzpatrick, Geyer, Hunter, Johnston, Jones of Tennessee, Mallory, Mason, Morton, Pratt, Sebastian, Slidell, Thompson of Kentucky, Toombs, Toucey, and Wells—24.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Badger, Bayard, Bell, Benjamin, Brainerd, Bright, Clayton, Cooper, Douglas, Gillette, Gwin, James, Jones of Iowa, Pettit, Rusk, Seward, Shields, Stuart, Sumner, Thomson of New Jersey, Walker, Weller, and Wright—24.

So the motion to reconsider was not agreed to. The bill was then ordered to a third reading, and read the third time, and the question being "Shall it pass?"

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee, called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 26, nays 22; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Badger, Bayard, Bell, Benjamin, Brainerd, Bright, Brown, Cass, Clayton, Cooper, Douglas, Gillette, Gwin, James, Jones of Iowa, Pettit, Rusk, Seward, Shields, Stuart, Sumner, Thomson of New Jersey, Walker, Weller, and Wright—26.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Brodhead, Butler, Chase, Clay, Dawson, Evans, Fitzpatrick, Geyer, Hunter, Johnson, Jones of Tennessee, Mallory, Mason, Morton, Pratt, Sebastian, Slidell, Toombs, Toucey, Wade, and Wells—22.

So the bill was passed.

TERRITORIAL POLICY.

SPEECH OF HON. H. C. GOODWIN,

OF NEW YORK,

In the House of Representatives,

February 27, 1855.

The House being in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union—

Mr. GOODWIN said:

Mr. Chairman: I have given the necessary notice, and have sought, and shall still seek, on the first proper occasion, to introduce a bill prohibiting slavery in the Territories of Kansas and Nebraska, and forbidding its introduction or establishment in any Territory of the United States. On this subject of the policy which should be adopted by the General Government in relation to the vast territorial possessions—organized and unorganized—of the United States, sufficient to constitute of themselves an empire, exceeding in limits the broad domains over which Rome, in the palmiest days of her power, reigned as the imperial mistress of nations, I desire to offer a few remarks, and involving, as whatever policy that may be permanently adopted, most vital principles and divine truth, that underlie the deep foundations of our civil superstructure; forming that solid granite strata on which rests the very pillars of our national greatness and success; giving birth to influences that are not to be confined within the narrow boundaries of the present, but reaching far into the future, will, with irresistible power, impress their character upon, and, as I firmly believe, control the destinies of our country. I trust I may be enabled to approach its consideration animated by that spirit of unselfish patriotism which regards the interests and welfare of the whole Union—that love of truth, humanity, and moral right which should always inspire an American Representative in the discharge of his duties.

Before entering upon the threshold of this discussion—for so unlimited is the field it opens and inexhaustible the theme it presents, that, in the brief hour allotted me, I can hardly hope to do more—it is perhaps proper for me to remark that I am fully conscious of the embarrassments which surround me; for, in addition to my own inexperience, and the disfavor and impatience with which the agitation of these questions are by many here received and listened to, I cannot but feel deeply sensible of the wide disparity and marked contrast that must be exhibited between any efforts of my own and those of my distinguished predecessor* on this floor. Here, with his prowess and triumphs as an orator, and abilities as a man, fresh in your recollections, I shall not, I am sure, be charged with indulging in the language of eulogy, or unmeaning compliment, when I say that his attractive and commanding eloquence, his high intellectual endowments and mental culture, have given him a position rarely attained in the arena of forensic effort; while the fascination of his social powers, his expansive benevolence and Christian philanthropy could not but win the regard and compel the respect of the members of this honorable body. And although I cannot hope to command the attention, nor receive the consideration so deservedly accorded to his superior eloquence and ability, I shall proceed, with the permission of the committee, to express briefly my views in relation to these questions, in the rightful settlement of which all sections of the country are alike deeply interested, and in so doing I shall offer no apology for speaking plainly and fearlessly; for while it is far from my desire to awaken bitterness of feeling, to renew any unnecessary strife, or wantonly wound the sensibilities, or treat with disrespect the opinions and prejudices of others, yet I believe it to be the solemn duty of the Representatives of the free States to speak out boldly and firmly, giving true, free, and adequate utterance to the deep feeling and earnest convictions that so universally pervade the northern mind in regard to the subject of the encroachments and extension of slavery. The action and measures of the Government for the last quarter of a century, the startling realities of the present, and those "coming events" that "cast their shadow before," imperatively require it, every consideration of public welfare and real patriotism demand it, and however the sentiments I feel impelled to express may be here received, and whatever of disapprobation and censure I may here incur by their utterance, yet, following in the clear pathway of duty, indicated by the dictates of my conscience and the convictions of my judgment, sustained by the knowledge that I am only giving expression to the almost unanimous views and opinions of an intelligent and patriotic constituency, I shall be content to await patiently the popular verdict, confident that, so surely as truth will triumph, the lessons of the past and the teachings of the future will vindicate the wisdom and rightfulness of the policy I advocate.

Mr. Chairman, I cannot concur with the sentiments expressed on this floor by the distinguished member from Missouri [Mr. Benton] and others, that all attempts to restore the clause of the Missouri compromise, which prohibits slavery in the Territories of Kansas and Nebraska, will prove unavailing; that further resistance and agitation should cease, and that the discussion of this question is now untimely and useless. There are many reasons, and, to my mind, convincing and unanswerable ones, why this contest should be maintained by the friends of freedom with all the vigor, spirit, and determination that a just and sacred cause can inspire; considerations that render the continued agitation and discussion of the policy of excluding slavery, not only from these, but from all the Territories of the Union, eminently meet and proper. It is well known, sir, that during the last session of Congress, when, unexpectedly and without warning, the bold proposition to repeal the Missouri compromise, to abrogate the "ordinance of freedom," in its application to these Territories, was forced upon the attention of this body, the proceeding was regarded by the whole country with utter surprise and astonishment. So far from its having been demanded by any expression of the public will, even the South had not asked it; no voice from any part of the country, either through the medium of the press, petitions, or public assemblies, had asked it; it had never been made an issue, nor discussed before the people; not a vote had been cast, nor a Representative elected in reference to it. This measure, of the greatest practical importance, working an entire change in the policy of the Government, ruthlessly overthrowing the barriers erected by the wisdom and patriotism of the past to stay the progress of slavery, and yielding up, in violation of public honor and faith, (so far as the legislation of Congress could do it,) to that now dangerously powerful institution, territory, rivalling in resources, fertility, and extent, the original States of this Union, was thus suddenly, and in a period of profound quiet, thrust upon the country. Its advocates, as if fearful—nay, conscious—of the result, refused to submit it to the people, and await their judgment, the issue was arbitrarily withheld from that high tribunal wherein is vested the real sovereignty of the land; and while there existed no color of necessity for immediate action, this legislation, unauthorized by the people, and involving their interests and welfare to an extent beyond the power of human judgment to measure, was hurriedly consummated. Its introduction and agitation created a degree of feeling, anxiety, and excitement rarely paralleled in our political annals. The press and the pulpit, institutions of learning, religious associations, the people in primary assemblies, and the Legislatures of sovereign States uttered their solemn protests. From commercial emporiums and inland cities, the numerous villages and settlements of the North, the East, and the West, came earnest voices of expostulation, remonstrance, and stern rebuke; the awakened masses petitioned Congress against the adoption of a policy that would place "free territory" at the mercy of an institution whose character is written in the fearful wrongs, the ruin, and desolation it has wrought; and when, in the face of these overwhelming popular demonstrations, in defiance and contempt of the public will, this measure, sustained and pressed by the strong arm of Executive power and patronage, aided by the votes of Representatives who had closed their ears to the entreaties and mandates of those who clothed them with "brief authority," was forced through the Halls of legislation by trampling upon the ordinary rules and correct principles of legislation; its final consummation caused the quick-pulsed billows of indignation to rush up from the depths, and surge over the troubled and heaving surface of the great deep of public sentiment, foreshadowing the gathering and breaking of that tempest which has since swept with resistless force over the face of the free States, burying in graves that know no political resurrection those who, although from the free North, yet had disregarded her convictions, sympathies, and conscience—who were deaf to the voices of freedom, justice, and humanity.

Sir, since the passage of this bill—since this policy which aims to strike down liberty in her own sanctuary, and raise up slavery, has become a law—the people have spoken in the manner provided to give form and authority to the expression of their will—through the ballot-box. Elections have been held in twelve of the States of this Union, containing a large proportion of the population of the whole country; the issue was distinctly made before the people; and most emphatic and conclusive is the verdict of condemnation they have rendered—everywhere the supporters of this measure were utterly overthrown and prostrated. The results have broken the power and paralyzed the strength and influence of the Administration. The immense patronage of the Executive is insufficient to redeem proffered pledges to supply with "lucrative places," and thus quarter upon the people the long list of the wounded and disabled who have fallen in this conflict, under the withering ban of the people's disapprobation. Already one hundred and seventeen Representatives, pledged to restore the prohibitions of slavery, have been returned to Congress. The senatorial elections, thus far, have achieved glorious triumphs for freedom. The Legislatures of Illinois and Michigan, States, in times past, distinguished for their subserviency to the slave power, have passed resolutions censuring the action of their Senators, and instructing them to vote for the restoration of the Missouri compromise. I thus hastily refer to these subsequent results that now form a part of the history of this eventful transaction, to show that, if the people had not been misrepresented and betrayed, this infraction of a solemn and time-honored covenant, this high-handed outrage on the rights of the North and the cause of freedom, could never have been accomplished.

Sir, the theory of our representative Government requires that these clear indications and expressions of the popular will should be here fully understood, considered, and respected; those clothed with executive or legislative authority should realize in their action that they are not the masters but the servants of the people; that it is not the part of Government to environ public sentiment with metes and bounds, to bid its strong tides to ebb and flow at its behests. The attempt is as vain and fruitless as that of Canute to sway the trident of Neptune, and speak the advancing waves back to their ocean bed. It is idle for members here to insist on silent acquiescence and shameful submission. The people have demanded that Congress should reconsider its legislation, undo this great wrong, and restore to freedom the fair heritage torn from her grasp by fraud and injustice. New England, with that staunch firmness and alacrity that partakes of the spirit of her pilgrim founders and her revolutionary battle-fields, has demanded it. The States of the great West—those Titans of the prairies, the youthful, but vigorous, offspring of the blessed ordinance of 1787—have demanded it. Redeemed Iowa, the only free child of the Louisiana purchase, Pennsylvania, and the Empire State, with a voice fitly symbolized by the thunders of her own Niagara, have demanded it. These potent responses of the people forbid a cessation of agitation and discussion; they urge Congress, with voices that may not be unheeded, to return to the pathways wherein are discernable the foot-prints of the early fathers of the Republic, and which are thickly studded with the land-marks erected by their wisdom and patriotism.

Mr. WITTE. I wish to ask the member from New York a question. Did I understand the gentleman to say that the voice of Pennsylvania has demanded the restoration of the Missouri compromise?

Mr. GOODWIN. I so regard it.

Mr. WITTE. I beg to say that the member from New York does not understand the estimation in which the people of Pennsylvania regard it. It has not so spoken. I say so in their name.

Mr. GOODWIN. Are not the majority of her Representatives elected to the next Congress in favor of the restoration of the Missouri compromise so far as to exclude slavery from these Territories?

Mr. WITTE. If a majority of the Representatives of Pennsylvania in the next Congress are in favor of the compromise, they do not represent the majority of the State.

Mr. GOODWIN. I would rather take the decision of the people of that State, as pronounced by her electors, than the opinion of any man.

Mr. HENN. As the gentleman has included Iowa in that sweeping charge, I wish to say to the gentleman that my successor is as strong a Nebraska man as ever was in this House, and he was elected upon that issue.

Mr. GOODWIN. Can you say that of Mr. Harlan, the Senator elect?

Mr. HENN. No, sir; I refer to Mr. Hall. And I will say to the gentleman from New York, that no senatorial election has taken place in Iowa constitutionally.

Mr. GOODWIN. How do the Representatives from Iowa stand in the next Congress?

Mr. HENN. Just as this does.

Mr. GOODWIN. What was the result of the election for members of her Legislature in regard to that question?

Mr. HENN. I will say to the gentleman, that the House of Representatives of Iowa passed anti-Nebraska resolutions, and the Senate indorsed the Baltimore platform.

Mr. GOODWIN. What are the views of the Senator elect, and of the Governor, who canvassed the State upon that direct issue?

Mr. HENN. He was elected on the Maine quor law, as much as on any other ism.

Mr. GOODWIN. Then, sir, anti-Nebraska and anti-liquor were joined together. They go well in company.

Mr. Chairman, I need not refer further to the results in these States. There, as in the State of New York, other issues may have entered somewhat into the canvass, but it is folly to attempt to conceal the great fact that it was the annulling of the slavery restrictions of 1820, and the violation of the spirit of those of 1787, to which circumstances had given the sanctity of constitutional enactments, that so deeply stirred the public mind, and mainly produced the decisive and overwhelming results the country has witnessed, of the Empire State and the verdict of her people. I can speak with full knowledge and authority, for I am from them and of them. I have felt the throbbings of the popular pulse. There is no mistaking her utterances, sir. A high sense of honor, a just appreciation of the dignity and sacredness of human rights, an irrepressible sympathy for the weak and wronged, and an inherent abhorrence of oppression in all of its forms, are sentiments inseparably intertwined with the very fibers of her great heart, its every life-beat is for freedom and against slavery; upon this issue she is on the side of justice, humanity, and good faith, and she has responded to the voices of her sister States as "deep calleth unto deep." And here, sir, let me say to the honorable member from North Carolina, [Mr. Ruffin,] who has this evening spoken in terms of disparagement and derision of the North and of the State of New York, and ridiculed and sneered at their abhorrence of the institution of slavery, which he declared to be "the greatest of political, social, and moral blessings," that in these vain attacks he but wastes his breath, and exhausts to no purpose the "stores of his rhetoric," and the "brilliants" of his fancy. From such impotent attacks New York needs no defense; she pleads her own cause; "there she stands" in her colossal greatness and massive strength, with that proud and expressive motto, "Excelsior," emblazoned on her front, by the general consent of her sister Sovereignties, in reality, as in name, the Empire State of this glorious Union. With her inexhaustible resources that are being steadily developed, her immense population and great wealth, earned by honest industry and free labor, with her vast commerce, her cities and villages, her system of common schools, and her great works of internal improvements, she challenges the respect and admiration of the world. Sir, as one of her humblest sons, I love to dwell upon the State of New York. While Egypt can boast of her grand and gigantic pyramids, Rome of her coliseum, her lofty domes and towers, and Greece of her graceful columns, and the beauty of her ruined fanes and temples—works that display the perfection of art and the power of genius, New York can point with just pride to her free schools, to her system of internal improvements, with its hundreds of miles of railroads and canals, the grand highways of commerce, trade, and travel; links that bind the prairies of the West to the shores of the Atlantic; works of real utility and practical beneficence that stand forth eloquent and impressive monuments of the wisdom and foresight, the energy and enterprise of her citizens. Sir, people educated in her schools, and reared under these influences, can never sanction the extension of slavery and the limitation of freedom.

Mr. Chairman, other recent developments require that this question should receive the renewed attention of Congress. It will be remembered that when this proposition was under consideration, its advocates, both in the Senate and in this House, insisted that those who were pleading for good faith, who stood up to the last against the consummation of this odious measure, were battling for a mere abstraction, that this was but the assertion of a principle, and that, so far as slavery was concerned, no practical effects could flow from it; that Nature's statutes, the soil and climate, shielded Kansas and Nebraska from the inroads of slavery—this was vociferously proclaimed to the whole country.

Senator Badger, of North Carolina, said:

"I have no more idea of seeing a slave population in either Kansas or Nebraska than I have of seeing it in Massachusetts—not a whit."

Senator Butler, of South Carolina, said:

"It is certain that Kansas and Nebraska will never be slaveholding States."

Senator Everett, of Massachusetts, said:

"I am quite sure everybody admits that this is not to be a slaveholding region."

Many others of both Houses expressed the same views. Representatives from the free States who gave it their support, as if in the condition of those on whom the malediction of the Scriptures had fallen: "Having eyes, yet they would not see, and ears, yet would not hear;" insensible to the signs of the times, and not realizing that there could be a North, seized upon this pretext as an excuse for, and a justification of, their actions. What has been the result? But a brief period has elapsed, and the disguise is now unblushingly thrown off, and the purpose of making Kansas a slave State is openly avowed. It is declared that this was the issue there made, at the late election of a Delegate to represent that Territory in Congress, and slavery is yet exultant over the triumph there achieved.

Sir, the scenes attendant upon that election illustrate the arrogant and aggressive spirit of this institution—its defiance of all "law and order." Armed bands of men from the neighboring slave State of Missouri flocked in great numbers to this Territory, and, at many of the precincts, surrounded the polls, overawed the inhabitants, cast their ballots, and usurped the rights of the citizens of Kansas, and thus, without the color or pretense of being residents of the Territory, controlled and impressed upon its first election the seal of proslaveryism.

And now, communications and addresses are paraded in the public prints to show that slavery will thrive and prosper in Kansas; that its soil and climate are favorable to the existence and growth of that institution; the prices current of men and women are published, ranging from $800 to $1,500, as evidence of the state of the market and the demand for human chattels. If, sir, all of the Representatives from the free States who supported this measure, and without whose aid it could not have become a law, could have realized, what seemed so apparent, that its chief end and aim was to exclude freedom from, and plant slavery in, these Territories; if they could have seen the results that have followed, and others that are foreshadowed, it would, perhaps, be unjust to suppose that a sufficient number could have been found so recreant and subservient as to have secured by their votes its passage. And now that there is no longer concealment, now that the form and shape it has assumed is familiar to all, Congress should awaken to the disgrace and infamy of planting, by the legislation of a free Government, slavery, the guiltiest of all despotisms, with its long train of blighting influences, in territory where, but for that legislation, the soil would never be cursed with its presence.

It is not my purpose to enter into a full discussion of the issues involved in the repeal of the Missouri compromise. The history of this legislation, its tendency, and purposes are yet fresh in the recollections of all; they are engraven on the public mind in characters that will not be easily effaced. As the bill I propose to introduce seeks to restore "the slavery restrictions" to the Territories of Kansas and Nebraska, I shall briefly glance at some of the main features of the controversy. In 1819, Missouri, a Territory organized from that vast area known as the Louisiana purchase, which our Government had acquired by a treaty with France, applied for admission into the Union as a slave State. This at once brought to an issue the question of applying the principles of the ordinance of 1787 to this and the other Territories of the United States. The House of Representatives insisted that Missouri should not be admitted except on the condition of the prohibition of slavery; the Senate took the opposite ground; thus the doors of the Union were closed against Missouri as a slave State. The whole country was shaken by the bitter and exciting contest that ensued.

In this crisis a compromise was proposed. It was warmly urged by the South, and reluctantly assented to by the North. That compromise provided that Missouri should be admitted as a slave State, and practically, that in all territory south of 36° 30' slavery should be free to enter, but that in all territory north of that line slavery should be forever prohibited. This was, in effect, at that time, a southern triumph. Announcing its adoption, Charles Pinckney said:

"At this moment we (the South) have carried the question to admit Missouri, and all of Louisiana south of 36° 30', free of the restriction of slavery. It will give the South in a short time six and perhaps eight members of the United States Senate. It is considered here, by the slaveholding States, as a great triumph."

It has given the South six Senators and thirteen members of this House, while Iowa is as yet the only free State formed from this whole Territory. This is the compromise that was annulled, this the compact that was violated by the legislation of last session—leaving the South in the full enjoyment of the fruits of that compromise, and wresting from the North the sole consideration that had been guarantied to her—the exclusion of slavery from those Territories—and leaving them an easy prey to this institution. The compromise of 1820, public honor, and good faith, require Congress to restore the prohibition of slavery to those Territories.

Sir, the bill which I propose not only seeks to restore the ordinance of freedom to the Territories of Kansas and Nebraska, but to exclude slavery from all the other Territories of the Union. This was the policy of the fathers of the Republic. They did not, like the honorable member from North Carolina [Mr. RUFFIN] regard the institution of slavery as a great political, social, and moral blessing. The honorable member sneeringly denounces the northern abhorrence for this institution which dethrones manhood, puts out the light of intellect, and reduces to the level of brute beasts and creeping things, beings created in the Almighty's image—they did not consider it worthy the eulogy bestowed upon it by the honorable member. In this respect, Mr. Chairman, though an humble individual, I am proud to stand on the same platform with George Washington, the Father of his Country, with Thomas Jefferson, with James Madison; a platform composed of the principles of all those great apostles of human freedom, who were baptized in the blood of the Revolution, and whose locks were sprinkled with the waters of that political Jordan through which they passed to the promised land of freedom.

I fear, Mr Chairman, that I am consuming too much of the time of the committee. [Cries of "No!" "Go on!"]

Mr. FLORENCE. I will ask the gentleman a question. While the gentleman is speaking of what he chooses to call freedom, it occurs to me that the opponents of what has been called the "Nebraska iniquity," the gentlemen from New York, [Messrs. HUGHES, HASTINGS, and others,] were not remarkably successful before the people. How was it that they were stricken down? I do not want to interfere in New York politics, but, inasmuch as the gentleman made a sweeping charge, I thought it best to make the suggestion which I have made.

Mr. HUGHES. I ask my colleague to yield the floor to me to reply to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. GOODWIN. Certainly, sir.

Mr. HUGHES. Mr. Chairman, I had no intention of entering into the debate this evening.

Mr. FLORENCE. I put the question to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. GOODWIN,] and would like the answer from himself.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I call the gentleman from Pennsylvania to order.

Mr. FLORENCE. I am not out of order, and do not intend to be called to order by the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I call the gentleman to order, and shall keep calling him to order so long as he is out of order.

Mr. FLORENCE. I should like to know how the gentleman gets the floor to call me to order.

Mr. GOODWIN. I yield the floor to my colleague, [Mr. HUGHES.]

Mr. FLORENCE. I put the question to the gentleman; and would rather have the answer from him. I do not ask his colleague to confess. I am not a father confessor.

Mr. GOODWIN. I am quite ready to answer the honorable member, but, at the request of my colleague, yield the floor to him.

Mr. HUGHES. Inasmuch as the gentleman from Pennsylvania has put himself in the position of a catechist, he certainly ought to allow those to respond who have been called by name. He ought not to insist on an answer from my colleague in a matter of which, perhaps, he knows nothing.

But to the point, Mr. Chairman; in pursuance of what I believed to be the wish of my constituents I did oppose to the utmost the passage of the bill to organize the Territories of Kansas and Nebraska. My action was from an honest conviction that I was truly representing the people who had confided their interests to me.

I returned, was a candidate for reëlection, but was not reëlected. There were four candidates in the district; and I can assure the committee, that at the next session there will be seen in the seat which I now occupy a gentleman who will oppose, inch by inch, step by step, and to the extremity, every effort made for the extension of slavery over any of the fair domain of the country. [Cries of "Good!" "Good!"] Sir, if called on to repeal the enactment of this Congress, to which I have already referred, he will go boldly to his object. Thinking that I have represented my people, I have acted as I have; but, sir, I am as sand in the balance to what that gentleman will do, and to the lengths which he will go. He is a warm, ardent Seward Whig; when I have said thus much, I presume that I have clearly defined his position. So far as the people are concerned it is, perhaps, due to them to say, that I believe they had the fullest confidence in their representative. The district which I have had the honor to represent upon this floor for two years, is politically opposed to me. It gave eleven hundred majority for General Scott as the Whig presidential candidate, while I was elected by three hundred majority. They have now claimed their right, and sent a Whig to represent them.

Mr. GOODE. I understand the gentleman from New York to say—I hope I misunderstood him—that he and the great body of northern Representatives in this Hall represent a constituency who mean to press to its passage a law prohibiting slavery from Kansas and Nebraska.

[Cries of "Certainly."]

Mr. GOODE. They mean to pass a law that slavery shall not be extended into the area of Territories belonging to the United States.

Mr. GOODWIN. Yes, sir, where it does not now exist.

Mr. GOODE. I understand the gentleman to say that slavery shall not be extended into any of the Territories of the United States; and that the northern Representatives will oppose the admission of Kansas as a slave State.

Mr. GOODWIN. If I were to be here I should vote against Kansas coming in as a slave State.

Mr. GOODE. Do the body of northern members represent a constituency of a like feeling? I wish it to be known. Let the southern people know the issue which is to be presented, which is presented in the United States Congress.

Mr. GIDDINGS. I will answer, if my friend from New York will permit me. Ohio has spoken her sentiments by eighty thousand majority.

Mr. GOODE. I do not care what is the majority.

Mr. GIDDINGS. Ohio will stop slavery from going into Kansas, Nebraska, or any other Territory of the United States.

Mr. GOODE. Do it! We defy you!

Mr. GOODWIN. I ask, Mr. Chairman, why in the name of justice, of right, of humanity, should not the North demand that slavery shall be excluded from Kansas and Nebraska—from all the Territories of this Union where it does not now exist? It is my belief that the principle of this exclusion was involved in the compromises which went before and prepared the way for the framing of the Constitution, that if the adoption of this principle had not been acceded to by the South, and established by a solemn ordinance in the nature of a compact between the States, the clauses in regard to the reclamation of fugitives from service, and in regard to slave representation, concessions so favorable to the South would never have found a place in that instrument, and although the grounds of this compromise are not set forth in the letter of the Constitution, yet it was to that concession that it, in a great measure, owed its existence. That concession to northern sentiment was the main, if not the only, substantial consideration for allowing the slave power to deform the Constitution with those two obnoxious provisions, for a slave representation and for the reclamation of fugitive slaves. It was thus one of the corner stones on which the Constitution and Union rested, one of the original compromises that entered into their formation.

Mr. MAXWELL. The remark just made by the gentleman from New York is one which I cannot understand without a more specific reference to the compromise to which he alluded than he has made. I should like to inquire of him, what is the particular character of that compromise to which he refers, and which forbids the southern people to come into any territory—common territory of the United States—with whatever property they may possess, making a distinction between our right to go to such territory and the right of the northern people to go to such territory with whatever property they may possess. Sir, I should like to inquire what is the character of that compromise which contains such a proposition, and what part of the proceedings of the convention which framed the Constitution, recognizes the right of the northern people, and denies the same right to the southern people?

Mr. GOODWIN. It is not proposed to deny to the southern people any right enjoyed by northern people. It gives you the same right to carry the same property into the Territories which northern people are allowed to carry there. The North seeks to exclude slavery from the Territories, and the prohibition excludes equally North and South from such power. When honorable members talk of a common right to carry property to the common Territories, they are seeking to do more than that, they propose to transplant there, a peculiar, social, and political institution essentially local in its character, and which the public law which obtains among States and sovereignties does not recognize. Beyond the force of the local law, which, by a notorious abuse of power transforms a man to a chattel, he ceases to be property. The possession and ownership of that which may be rightfully held as property, may be vindicated by principles of universal law, but this idea of property in man depends upon the statutes of slave States. The character of property does not go with the person upon the free soil of a free Republic, under a Constitution formed under a compromise by which slavery was to be excluded from all the common soil of the Republic.

But to return to my argument upon that compromise. And, sir, I will tell you upon what I base that compromise, and upon what the ordinance of 1787 rests. I have not time to enter into a minute historical argument, but I believe this great fact, viz: the exclusion of slavery from all the territory of the Confederacy as a condition for slave representation and slave reclamation—is clearly deducible from the history of the Congress of the Confederation, and from that of the convention that framed the Constitution. I shall merely present a condensed statement of some of the principal facts which authorizes this conclusion. In 1784, Virginia and other States ceded to the General Government the vast extent of territory lying northwest of the river Ohio, this comprised all of the territory that was in the possession, or under the jurisdiction of the United States at the period of the formation of the Constitution, as early as 1784. Indeed, on the very day of the cession, Thomas Jefferson—whose doctrines and ideas I would commend to those who believe slavery to be a great political, moral, and social blessing—introduced in Congress a plan for the government of said territory, providing, among other things, that slavery should be excluded therefrom after the year 1800, but the measure was defeated. In 1785, Rufus King, of New York, proposed in Congress a similar act of legislation, which that body also refused to adopt. It was then claimed by Representatives from slave States, that the citizens of their States should have the right to settle in said territory with their slave property, while a large majority of the people were determined that slavery should be excluded, and the question remained unadjusted.

It is to be observed that the session before referred to constituted all the public territory in the possession of the United States, or within its jurisdiction. It was all that was expected to be had in all time, for the idea was not then entertained of acquiring territory by purchase or treaty. Neither under the Constitution, or by any other act, had they provided for any territorial extension, and in the settlement of the then pending question they applied a principle which they supposed would cover all the territory that would ever be within the limits of the Union.

Well, sir, what were the next steps towards a solution of these difficulties? We find that in May, 1784, the third year after the cession of their lands by the States, a convention met at Philadelphia to reorganize the Government, and perfect the union of these States. The old Congress of the Confederation was at the same time in session in the city of New York. In the convention, also, the subject of slavery, and questions arising therefrom, prevented cordial union among the members of that body upon any plan of a Constitution. The South demanded the right to reclaim fugitive slaves, and the North insisted, not only that slavery should not be recognized by the Constitution, but that slaves should not be taken into account in apportioning the Representatives of the different States. Here we behold a striking coincidence, and the circumstances compel the conclusion that there was a full understanding between the two bodies convened at Philadelphia and New York. The Congress of the Confederation was considering plans for the proper government of the northwestern territory, and on the 9th of July, 1787, a committee was appointed to report thereon, and on the 11th of that month the committee reported. Its chairman was a Virginian.

Mr. GOODE. Name him.

Mr. GOODWIN. I think it was Mr. Nicholas.

Mr. GOODRICH. If the gentleman from New York will yield to me for a moment, I desire to read a paragraph, which I have in my desk, upon this point, for the information of the gentleman from Florida, [Mr. Maxwell.] During the discussion in the United States Senate, while the compromise measures were under consideration, Mr. Webster, on the 7th of March, made a speech upon that subject, in which, after referring to the sitting at the same time of the Congress of the Confederation and the Convention which framed the Constitution, he says:

"There was a perfect concurrence of opinion between these respective bodies, (the Congress that passed the ordinance and the Convention that framed the Constitution,) and it resulted in this ordinance of 1787."

When Mr. Webster sat down, Mr. Calhoun rose, and here is what he said:

"He [Mr. Webster] states very correctly that it [the ordinance] commenced under the old Confederation; that Congress was sitting in New York at the time, while the Convention sat in Philadelphia, and that there was concert of action."

Concert of action in regard to the question of slavery. Mr. Calhoun added:

"When it [the ordinance] was proposed, as I have good reason to believe, it was upon a principle of compromise, first, that the ordinance should contain a provision similar to the one put in the Constitution with respect to fugitive slaves, and next, that it should be inserted in the Constitution; and this was the compromise upon which the prohibition of slavery was inserted in the ordinance of 1787."

These are Mr. Calhoun's words. You will find them in his speech.

Mr. GOODWIN. Yes, Mr. Chairman, that exhibits the idea I wish to express. The ordinance provided that there should "be neither slavery or involuntary servitude in said Territory, except as punishment for crime," &c. Thus this measure which had been defeated when introduced by Jefferson three years before, which was voted down when presented by Rufus King two years before, and the consummation of which had been successfully withstood for three years, was now adopted by the votes of all the Representatives North and South, save only Robert Yates. I ask why this sudden change? Before, for three years, the South had continually defeated it, now they are unanimous in its favor. Without a dissenting voice they accept the ordinance proclaiming that slavery should be forever excluded from the Northwest Territory, then all the territory that our legislation could affect. Immediately upon this, the Convention proceeded with its work, and at once agreed to do, and did, what it before had been unable to do, namely, provided for the reclamation of fugitives from service, and for a representation in Congress for slaves, and upon this basis, in consideration of the freedom of the Territories, the Constitution, as regards these clauses, was adopted.

These proceedings in these two bodies, founded on mutual considerations and concessions, want nothing of the elements of a solemn compact between the contending States; and one of the sections of the ordinance provides that it shall be regarded as in the nature of a compact between the several States, and the States and Territories to which it was applicable. The Constitution of the United States, recognizing the obligation of the compact formed in the Congress of the Confederation, gave to it a further approbation and sanction. From this concurrence of circumstances I claim for this ordinance a validity and solemnity equal to those of the provisions of the Constitution itself.

Mr. GOODE. I understand the gentleman from New York to say, that the ordinance of 1787 met with universal approbation at the South.

Mr. GOODWIN. I state that it received every southern vote in that Congress.

Mr. GOODE. The Continental Congress which adopted the ordinance of 1787 is the body of which the gentleman speaks?

Mr. GOODWIN. Yes, sir.

Mr. GOODE. Then I wish the gentleman to have the candor to state that, whilst the southern States voted for the ordinance of 1787 as a form of government for the territory northwest of the Ohio river, they voted against that provision of the ordinance which contains the prohibition of slavery; and that Mr. Jefferson and one other individual were the only men from the South who cast their votes in the Continental Congress in favor of that provision of the ordinance of 1787. Is not that true?

Mr. GOODWIN. I am speaking of its final adoption by that Congress.

Mr. GOODE. Is not that the truth?

Mr. GOODWIN. Let me state what I understand to be the facts.

Mr. GOODE. Search the record. Search the Journal. That is the fact.

Mr. GOODWIN. The honorable member seems to be excited.

Mr. GOODE. Well, sir, I ought to be excited [Cries of "Order!" "Order!"]

Mr. GOODE. Nobody can call me to order about a matter of this sort.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia is out of order. Does the gentleman from New York yield further to the gentleman?

Mr. GOODWIN. No, sir; the gentleman does not want me to do so, as I understand it. I am speaking of the vote on the passage of this ordinance of 1787, and I declare that my recollection is that not a single Representative in Congress, either from the North or from the South, save one, voted against it.

Mr. GOODE. Mr. Jefferson voted in favor of that provision of the ordinance of 1787 which excluded slavery from the Territory, and so did a Representative from North Carolina, but the body of the slaveholding States voted against that provision when the question came up on inserting it in the ordinance of 1787, as a form of government for the Territory.

Mr. GOODWIN. I think I have yielded sufficiently now.

Mr. GOODE. We of the South have yielded sufficiently, God knows!

Mr. GOODWIN. I trust you will have to yield still more.

Mr. GOODE. Well, I do not think we will.

Mr. GOODWIN. I have given my recollection of the vote on the passage of the ordinance of 1787, which included this provision. I may be mistaken. My recollection does not partake of infallibility.

Mr. UPHAM. If I may be allowed to make a statement which I think all gentlemen who are familiar with the records of that period will affirm to be correct, I will make it briefly, in reference to the point at issue between the gentlemen. It is true that the southern Representatives in the old Congress did vote almost unanimously against the restriction clause when introduced by Mr. Jefferson, and when introduced by Mr. King. But, sir, when, on the 9th of July, 1787, a committee was appointed, of which Mr. Carrington of Virginia was chairman, for the purpose, and under instructions, forthwith to bring in an ordinance for the establishment of a civil government in the Northwestern Territory, that committee did bring in a report two days afterwards, on the 11th of July, and that report was precisely the ordinance of 1787 as it passed the next day, with the exception of the sixth article. The committee made no report on the 11th in reference to the question of slavery; and if gentlemen will go to the library of Colonel P. Force in this city, they will see in print—printed at the time—the report which that committee made. He will show you the original document which was laid on the table of the members, and you will there find attached to that printed document, by a wafer, a fly-leaf some two or three inches square, on which the sixth article is found in the hand-writing of Nathan Dane, of Massachusetts; and that sixth article is substantially Mr. Jefferson's restrictive clause with a proviso, which proviso is the obligation to submit to the reclamation of fugitive slaves. That proviso was offered by Nathan Dane that day as a compromise, as a make-weight. The offer was at once accepted, and every member of that Congress from the southern States and from the northern States save one, on the 12th of July, recorded his vote on the Journal in favor of that restrictive clause. The whole proceeding is exhibited in the most interesting form and shape; and what is most peculiar and really striking and affecting in the case, is that that very document—printed, not in the style in which we print our bills now, but in a style adapted to the simple habits of the revolutionary age—that original document, which Colonel Force will show you, is the identical document which was laid on the table by Nathan Dane, and to which he attached that fly-leaf, containing his amendment, which, accepted and inserted, is the sixth article of that immortal instrument—every southern member in the Congress voting for it.

Mr. GOODWIN. As I before said although the doctrine that slavery shall be excluded from the Territories is not declared in express words in the body of the Constitution, it essentially forms part and parcel of it; it is one of the corner stones upon which it rests. To establish the other compromises it was necessary to express them in the instrument, as it created the rights and privileges which constituted them, and they had no existence aside from the Constitution, but this great principle of exclusion had to be established (and unalterably as was supposed) before the Constitution could come into existence. The fathers of the Constitution intended to give it a permanency equal to that of the provisions of the Constitution; as their action and its language shows:

"It is hereby ordained and declared by the authority aforesaid, that the following articles shall be considered as articles of compact between the original States and the people and the States in the said Territory, and forever remain unalterable unless by common consent."

Then follows the clause prohibiting slavery, and the Constitution, when subsequently adopted, seemed, as before noticed, to have in view the recognition of this compact, and provided (article six) that engagements entered into before its adoption should be as valid under this Constitution as under the Confederation. Neither the Constitution or laws provided for, nor did the fathers anticipate, the acquisition of additional territory. The principle they sought to establish was the non-extension of slavery, its exclusion from all the territories of the United States, its limitation to the States where it already existed. The simple fact alone of the application of the ordinance of 1787 to all of the territory then belonging to the United States establishes this. To this policy the South acceded, and received her consideration therefor in the advantages secured to her by the compromises in the Constitution. Therefore it follows, as a matter of justice and right, that this policy, so long as the South is enjoying the benefits secured to her by these considerations, should be extended over all of the territory subsequently acquired by the United States, especially over that portion wherein slavery did not exist at the time it was acquired. To admit slavery into free territory; to break down the barriers that arrest its progress, is to destroy one of the compromises on which the Constitution rests, and would violate the spirit of a compact interwoven with the existence of the Constitution. I hold, therefore, that the prohibition of slavery should not only be restored to Kansas and Nebraska, but be applied to all of the Territories of the United States.

POWER OF CONGRESS TO EXCLUDE SLAVERY FROM THE TERRITORIES.

Mr. Chairman, I am aware that it is claimed by some that Congress has not the power to exclude slavery from the Territories of the Union. Now, the Constitution authorizes Congress to "make all needful rules and regulations" respecting the Territories of the United States. When we remember that rules and laws are synonymous terms; that the commentators define law to be a rule of action, and thus give to the clause the same force as if the word rules was changed for that of laws, it seems very clear that the power to legislate for the Territories is expressly delegated to Congress. This would, of necessity, include the right to prohibit slavery therein.

But if the Constitution was silent, there is another source from which Congress derives the right to legislate for the government of the Territories. The power to acquire territory, by conquest or treaty, carries with it the right to govern and control it when acquired. The territory ceded to the United States by other nations, was ceded "in full property and sovereignty" upon the cession; all the power these nations possessed over these territories became vested in our Government, subject only to the restrictions of the Constitution; their power to exclude slavery therefrom—and that they had the power no one will deny—was transferred to the United States, and as the legislative power is vested in Congress, and there is nothing in the Constitution forbidding Congress to exclude slavery from the Territories, the conclusion is inevitable that Congress does possess this power; and, possessing it, is responsible for the necessary and rightful use of it. An unbroken line of precedents, from the first foundation of the Government down to the present time, also establishes the existence of this power.

Others, sir, while they admit that Congress may possess this power, insist that its exercise would be a usurpation of the rights of the people, and with the cry of non-intervention and popular sovereignty—quack phrases used as a garb to conceal the enormity and wickedness of the designs of slavery propagandists—demand that the walls of circumvallation, which our fathers, fresh from the Revolution, inspired by that spirit that was with and upheld them, in those days that "tried men's souls," had sought to erect around this institution, should be overthrown; that all compromises or covenants, however solemn and binding, that place obstacles in its pathway, should be violated; that slavery should be left unrestricted to acquire new power and possessions. Disguise it as you may, this is practical intervention against freedom, and in behalf of slavery. The sham non-intervention and popular sovereignty of this policy are used like the "silver veil" which the false prophet and imposter, "Mokanna," as described in the "Veiled Prophet of Khorassan," had flung over his features, as his deluded followers believed, —"to hide from mortal sight

His dazzling brow, till man could bear its light."

But, in fact, to conceal their terrible deformity and ugliness—but the similitude and deception does not stop here—this imposter chief could also use the "words" and "ideas" of liberty to delude and betray, for there was

—"emblaz'd
On the white flag Mokanna's host unfurl'd
Those words of sunshine, 'Freedom to the World.'"

And when, by perfidy and crimes unutterable, this mocking fiend had lured his followers to destruction—involved in common ruin, from which there was no escape—he raised the veil and, "as in death's agony they gazed," they beheld, not the promised light of a beaming brow that was to save them from the terrors of death,

"But features horrible*r* than hell e'er traced
On its own brood;—no demon of the waste;
No church-yard Ghole caught lingering in the light
Of the bless'd sun e'er blasted human sight
With lineaments so foul, so fierce as those.
Tho' imposter now, in grinning mockery, shows"—
"There ye wise saints, behold your light, your star, Ye would be dupes and victims, and ye are."

So this policy, adopted at the last session of this body, beneath these "popular phrases," exhibits, when the veil is raised, the deformed and horrid features of slavery, exulting over its triumph and the delusion of its "dupes and victims." Unless Congress exercises its vested powers to exclude slavery from the Territories, "those features" will become impressed upon all the institutions of our country.

Mr. Chairman, to show the necessity of congressional legislation to exclude slavery from the Territories, I had intended to speak of the political, social, and moral evils of that institution, as portrayed by Washington, Jefferson, Madison, and all of the early statesmen of the South—as exhibited in the experience of the past, and as evidenced by its present influences—of its destruction of the rights of free labor, making honest industry a badge of degradation and dishonor; thus rendering it impossible for free and slave labor to exist together; of its confining the advantages of education and knowledge to the few, and withholding them from the many; of its baneful effects in exhausting the soil, dwarfing the energies, and paralyzing the enterprise of the people who dwell underneath its dark shadow, but time will not permit, and I must draw my remarks to a close.

Sir, it is only by fulfilling the purposes and pledges of the fathers of the Republic in excluding slavery from the Territories, and by divorcing the National Government from all connection with, and responsibility for, this institution, that peace and quiet can be restored, and this vexed question settled. We seek not to penetrate the limits of the States to interfere with the institutions therein; there we leave the subject to be controlled and regulated by your local laws. But, sir, in the national domain over which the national flag waves we claim; the soil shall not be darkened by its presence. Until these "covenants of the fathers," expressed and implied, are observed and executed, there will be strife and agitation and the continued unrest of the public mind and excitement of the people, awakened by the fresh aggressions of slavery, are as the unquiet heavings of the "billows gathering on the ocean's breast," and the cry wrung from outraged humanity, the wail of the sea-bird that tells the coming of the storm.

Sir, this question, by the force of its importance and the magnitude of the interests at issue, demands the attention of Congress; involving great questions of human rights, the fundamental principles of Government, and the honor and welfare of the only Republic upon the face of the earth, it rises in its proportions to a grandeur and sublimity, by the side of which other questions of Government policy are dwarfed into insignificance. It cannot be evaded. Like the fabled sphinx of old, it stands by the way side that leads to our country's future; and the riddle it propounds must be solved by the legislation of Congress. May that legislation be such as becomes a people upon whom a beneficent Providence has showered with so prodigal a hand the rich blessings of well regulated and enlightened freedom.

TERRITORIAL POLICY.

SPEECH OF HON. JOHN LETCHER,

OF VIRGINIA,

In the House of Representatives,

February 27, 1855.

The House being in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union—

Mr. LETCHER said:

Mr. Chairman: I have listened with a great deal of attention, and no small degree of surprise, to the speech just delivered by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. Goodwin.] We are all citizens of the same Government; we all have a common interest in this Union, and it is well enough for us, coming from different sections of the country, to understand the precise position which each is to occupy for the future. The gentleman commenced his remarks by stating to the committee that he meant to speak candidly and frankly—that he meant to give us of the South notice of the position which the North occupied, that we might understand hereafter the course of events. Now, sir, I desire to know, in order to a correct understanding, whether it is the national sentiment of the North, so far as that gentleman is aware, that, at the next Congress, an attempt is to be made to repeal the fugitive slave law, or to modify that law in such a manner as to annex to it the condition of a jury trial in the place in which the absconding slave may be arrested?

Mr. GOODWIN. I cannot tell what the decision of the whole North would be on that question, but I, for one, speaking for myself, should be very happy, indeed, to see it done.

Mr. LETCHER. As I understood the gentleman from New York, awhile ago, he undertook to speak, not only for himself, but for the Empire State. He undertook to declare what the public sentiment of that State was on the great question in which the South was interested, and in which the existence of the Union itself was concerned.

Mr. GOODWIN. The gentleman did not understand me correctly. In speaking of the sentiment of the North, and the sentiment of the State of New York, I spoke of the decision they had rendered in reference to the repeal of the Missouri compromise, and that there was a great majority there in favor of the restoration of the restriction of the Missouri compromise, excluding slavery from these Territories.

Mr. LETCHER. I will come to that question in due time. Let us get back to the point. I want to ascertain, and it is due to that section of the country from which I came, that it should know, whether it is the settled and fixed purpose of the North to undertake to interfere with the fugitive slave law, either by a repeal or by such a modification of its provisions as shall render the law no longer a safe and efficient protection for us in the recovery of our slave property.

So far as that point is concerned, let it pass, as the gentleman finds difficulty in answering my question, and let me come to another point. I desire to know whether it is the settled policy of New York, or whether it is the settled policy of the North, in a future Congress, to attempt to revive the Missouri restriction.

Mr. GOODWIN. I understand that a great majority of the electors of the State of New York are in favor of restoring the slavery restriction to the Territories of Kansas and Nebraska, and are opposed to the introduction of slavery therein.

Mr. LETCHER. That is frank, and I understand exactly what the position of the gentleman is. I understand it to be openly proclaimed that, at the next session of Congress, an attempt is to be made to bring about this result; and I imagine, from the manner in which the gentleman speaks, and from the sentiments which have been uttered by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. Giddings] to-night, that this is their fixed and settled purpose, and even the sanctity of the Union or the preservation of the Government will not prevent them from making the effort.

I desire to know, upon the third point, what is the settled policy of the State of New York, or the northern portion of this Confederacy, in regard to the exclusion of slavery, by congressional prohibition, from the Territories—the common property of the nation. A gentleman suggests here, that this necessarily embraces the point to which I have already referred. I will ask, then, whether it is the settled policy of the North to resort to northern power in this House, for the purpose of excluding, in all time to come, by the exercise of congressional power, slavery from the Territories of Kansas, Nebraska, or any other, which has been acquired by the common blood and common treasure of this country?

Then, upon the fourth point, I desire to know how the Empire State and the North stand. Are they in favor of passing a law here at a future session of Congress abolishing slavery in the District of Columbia?

Mr. GOODWIN. I cannot speak, of course, in relation to the action of the North upon this subject.

Mr. LETCHER. Well, of the Empire State, then.

Mr. GOODWIN. I have no doubt that the State of New York would be in favor—I certainly am—of submitting the proposition to the people of this District to determine whether they would abolish slavery therein or not.

Mr. LETCHER. It will be recollected by every gentleman who has recurred to the history of past events, that, upon one occasion, a Representative from the State of New York introduced upon this floor a proposition, which was adopted by this House, to abolish slavery in the District of Columbia.

I have now obtained the answers to the questions I proposed, and these answers are pregnant with meaning to the South. It is important to us that we should understand the purposes and objects of the northern people. It is important to us, for the reason that the South should come here at the next session with a spirit of determination prepared to resist any effort of this sort on the part of the North, be the consequences what they may. If this Union cannot be preserved upon terms of equality, and if the territory of this country, acquired by the common blood and common treasure, is not to be open alike to the North and the South, then we desire to be informed of the fact; and whenever the crisis comes, the Union must be dissolved, whatever may be the regret that will attend its dissolution. I, for one, regarded as one of the most conservative men in my own State, and unwilling to believe that there was a settled purpose of this kind anywhere, am yet prepared for the result, whenever these issues shall be forced upon us by the people of the North. I shall stand by the rights of the land in which I was born, and in which, I trust, my bones shall repose. I ask nothing here but what I am willing to accord to others; and so long as I have life, or voice, or an arm to raise, they will be raised in defense of the rights, institutions, and honor of the glorious South. The Union has its benefits and blessings. I acknowledge them all; but a Union based upon other principles than those of equality has no charms for me. I come from a State which has maintained her rights in times past, and which will stand by them in all time to come, with equal firmness. Whenever an attempt is made to strike down her institutions, and interfere with the rights of her citizens, the North will find that Virginia can and will exhibit a spirit of stern resistance, that she will stand by her rights and institutions to the death.

Mr. HUGHES. If the people of the State of Virginia, or, more particularly, of the district which the gentleman represents so ably upon this floor, felt it to be for their interest, and that the right belonged to them to do it, to ask for the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia, would the gentleman then vote for such a proposition?

Mr. LETCHER. I hold that we have no right to meddle with it at all; that Congress has no business to pass a law interfering with it; that it is an usurpation of power, which can lead to nothing but mischief.

Let me say another thing to the gentleman from New York. God knows the gentleman went far enough last year with the anti-Nebraska party in this war against the institutions of the South; yet it seems that he did not go far enough for his constituents, and he was thrown, therefore, overboard, and a regular Seward Whig sent here in his place. It seems that the gentleman did not go far enough. Out of the Democrats sent here to this Congress how many are left to tell the tale? Is there a solitary one sent to the next Congress who voted for the Nebraska bill?

Mr. HUGHES. Not one.

Mr. LETCHER. There is the evidence of what is the feeling of the Empire State, to which the gentleman over the way [Mr. Goodwin] referred, and this is one of the States where they say a great national party has sprung up, that is to preserve the Union, that is to keep off agitation so far as the question of slavery is concerned. Here is the evidence—a solid column of anti-Nebraska men, prepared to vote for a repeal of the fugitive slave law, to resist the introduction of slavery into the Territory of Kansas, even if the people of that Territory wish it; and, if I understand their sentiments, they are ready to vote against the admission of Kansas, if it shall apply for admission into this Union as a slave State. Is it not so? What member from the North on this floor will deny that such are the opinions of the people he represents on this floor?

Mr. HAMILTON. I have the floor, I believe, but I merely wish to say now that it is not my purpose to interrupt this general debate. I wish to say something to-morrow on the Army appropriation bill.

Mr. HUGHES. I only wish to say that there is an election coming off in Virginia.

Mr. LETCHER. I feel very little concern about it, so far as my own election is concerned; for my friends, both Whigs and Democrats, who have always shown me so much kindness, assure me that I will have no opposition.

Mr. GIDDINGS. Will the gentleman from Maryland yield the floor a few minutes, as I wish to reply to the gentleman from Virginia?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will remind the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. Hamilton] that he obtained the floor fifteen minutes before ten o'clock. Does he yield to the gentleman from Ohio? [Mr. Giddings.]

Mr. LETCHER. If I am taking the time of my friend from Maryland, I shall resign the floor at once.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I suggest that, by unanimous consent, the gentleman from Maryland shall be allowed to take the floor for as much time as he wants, within an hour, after this running fire is concluded.

[Cries of "Agreed!" "Agreed!"]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will not decide that that can be done until to-morrow morning.

Mr. GIDDINGS. I will express to the committee my gratification at having the privilege of exchanging sentiments with the able gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. Letcher,] who represents a different section of the country from that which I represent. I am pleased to say that the gentleman from Virginia and myself can talk over this matter like men, as become statesmen, without undue excitement. I am willing—having held a seat here for some time, and expecting to continue here for some two years more—to say to this House and the country what I understand to be the northern sentiment prevailing in the free States, so far as I understand it; and I wish to do it in a dispassionate manner, that all shall explicitly comprehend my views. I do understand that, in the convention which framed the Constitution, it was understood, most distinctly and explicitly, that slavery was a State institution, confined to State jurisdiction, with which the Federal Government neither had nor should have any power to interfere.

Mr. LETCHER. I want the gentleman to come to the present issue. I want to know what we may expect now, not what has occurred heretofore.

Mr. GIDDINGS. I will do so. Mr. Gerry declared in that Convention that slavery was a State institution; that while the Federal Government had no jurisdiction over it we should be careful to lend it no sanction. To this that body lent an implied approval, no member dissenting from it, but all apparently coinciding with the view of Mr. Gerry. Now, sir, I say to the honorable gentleman from Virginia, and to the House, that the freemen of the free States intend to carry out in practice this doctrine of the Constitution and of the fathers of our Republic. We intend to separate this Government and the people of the free States from all responsibility and all guilt of sustaining oppression, of upholding slavery, and direct its action to the encouragement of liberty, virtue, and the elevation of our race. Our people intend to be purified from the crimes and iniquities of slavery and the slave trade. While we leave the institution with the slave States, untouched by our legislation; while we guard all the States in the enjoyment of their privileges, we will protect our own rights with equal assiduity.

Now, sir, in order to do this—for I only rose to state to my friend what I understand to be the issues involved in the present conflict as to slavery in the District of Columbia, to which the gentleman last alluded—I will first reply, that we will secure to the people here "popular sovereignty." We will repeal the laws which we have enacted, which now sustains slavery and the slave trade here, and leave the people of this District to maintain their "popular sovereignty," of which we heard so much from my friend and his party at the last session of Congress. I mean all the people, black and white, permitting each to be sovereign of his own conduct, so long as he interferes with the rights of no other person. That we will not, by the law of Congress, rivet the chains, nor put hand-cuffs upon our fellow-men here; that we will withdraw our power from the support of slavery, and leave the whole people of this District to enjoy their popular sovereignty. I do not think we shall ask the people of the District whether we may separate ourselves from the support of slavery here; we will do it of our own emotion, our own judgment. We will not share the guilt, nor the disgrace, of upholding the slave trade here, of sustaining the practice of rearing boys and girls for the market in this city. We are not going to interfere with slavery here; we will cease to interfere with that institution; but we will encourage freedom, not slavery. We do not intend to say that men here shall be free. God and nature have said that—and we will protect the rights which our Creator has conferred on mankind.

And I further say to the gentleman, that, in the next place, we will take good care to follow in the footsteps of Jefferson, and of the Congress of 1787, and exclude slavery from every foot of territory belonging to this Government by law of Congress.

I say again, I have had some experience here, and expect to be a member of the next Congress; and I do expect, as I expect to live and get back here, to see the next Congress bring in a bill, and pass it through this body, that shall strike the chains from every slave within the territory of the Federal Government. This, sir, is the great and principal issue on which nearly all men of all parties at the North unite, which no party can withstand. Some may hesitate on other points, but this is one on which we intend to unite in all elections, making it a test with all candidates for office; but we will do it without excitement. [Laughter.] With this, however, is connected another, the exclusion of any slave State which may seek admission to the Union. We will never give to another State the odious superiority over ourselves of holding an influence over the free States proportioned to the number of their slaves, allowing five slaves to be equal to three of our freemen. The man who would thus degrade the freemen of the North will be regarded as a traitor to northern honor and northern interests. We intend doing this, and I would respectfully say that no threats of dissolving the Union will deter us. That mode of frightening our people has been too often, and too long resorted to. It has lost its prestige. It has ceased to frighten our school girls. We hope to act like statesmen, like men who have their country, and their country's good at heart, who labor for freedom, for the happiness of mankind. We expect to maintain the rights which we ourselves hold under this Government. We intend that freedom, the liberty of man shall be the objects of this Government, and not slavery. Understand—for I have been misrepresented for twenty years—I have never thought of interfering with the rights of the slave States; I have never maintained upon this floor, by the way side, by the fire side, nor have I, in public or in private, intimated that we possess the power to interfere with slavery in the States. On the contrary, I repeat, that while we protect the Constitution, and assiduously maintain it in its full force, we will take care to maintain the rights which it confers upon the North, as well as the privileges of the South; we will maintain the rights of the free States, as well as those of the slave States. Our rights in Ohio are equal to those of the other States. We mean to wield the Government for the purpose of maintaining the freedom of every foot of soil subjected to the laws of Congress, and against the extension of the slave power by admitting any new slave State.

The next point, Mr. Chairman, is that of prohibiting the sale of any human being under process issued from the Federal courts. We will not prostitute the process of the Federal courts to the purpose of selling men and women at public auction. I want my friend to understand this issue in its full length and breadth.

Next, we will repeal the law of 1807, authorizing the coast-wise slave trade. We will not protect the slave trade on our southern coast, nor will we lend our power to encourage men while dealing in slaves. The pirate that hangs at the yard-arm on the coast of Africa is less guilty, in our opinion, than the man who deals in Christian slaves in this city. We will, therefore, repeal the law referred to, which authorizes the transportation of slaves under the flag of the United States. It is our flag, and it shall not be prostituted to such damnable and disgraceful purposes. We will purify it, and leave slave-dealers to take care of their slaves in their own manner. We will not suffer our moral purity to be contaminated by this infamous traffic in human flesh. We will lustrate ourselves from it. We will purify the Government from it. Do not talk about the dissolution of the Union; we mean to elevate the people of the southern as well as those of the northern States. Our object is the increase of intelligence, virtue, and happiness of all the people.

Mr. Chairman, besides all this we are of the opinion that we shall let the slaveholders catch their own slaves. We will not go one step beyond the law of 1793. That law gave no process, but allowed the slaveholder to catch his slave if he could, and permitted the slave to escape if he could. That law was signed by Washington. It was an enactment of those who had framed the Constitution in part. That law gave no process, authorized no officer to issue process, made it the duty of no officer to arrest a slave; nor did it require northern men to aid in such arrest, nor to pay the expense of taking such slave back to servitude. The law of 1850 is, in all these points, unconstitutional. Our feelings revolt at these provisions—we will not carry them out, nor will we obey them. I therefore say that the furthest extent to which we will go will be to restore the law of 1793. We will not catch your slaves for you. It is humiliating, degrading to our natures. Why, sir, let me ask the gentleman from Virginia whether he would turn out, run after, and catch a slave for any other man under Heaven?

Mr. LETCHER. Go on.

Mr. GIDDINGS. Will you answer? I will reply to any question propounded to me on this important subject. But as the gentleman from Virginia does not answer, I will ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. WITTE,] whether he would run after, chase down, and catch a slave for a slaveholder?

Mr. LETCHER. I have not surrendered the floor to the gentleman. I want him to go on. When he concludes I intend to comment on the revelations which he has made, and may yet make before he concludes.

Mr. GIDDINGS. I am commenting on the last point. We will live up to all our constitutional obligations; there we stop. If you can catch your slaves when they get away into our northern States, do it; we will not catch them for you; we will not appoint officers for the purpose of catching them; we will not pay for catching them. The Constitution imposes no such obligation upon us. Catch your slaves as you can, but do not ask us to lay aside our feelings of manhood, our moral principles, our independence, and self-respect to catch them for you.

Mr. Chairman, I can just here give an illustration. A fugitive slave came to me and asked my advice as a lawyer. It was when we were under the old law; and I did not hesitate to advise and counsel those who called on me. Looking the man full in the face, I said: "Do you believe, sir, that God created you with the soul and feelings of a man? That He endowed you with the inalienable right to life, liberty, and happiness?" "I do," was his prompt and earnest reply. "Have you the manhood to assert and defend those rights?" "I have," said he. "Then do it," was my reply. "I cannot defend you; but, were I in your place, I would defend my liberty while I could wield a weapon." I do not hesitate to tell them that they are men; that we shall not stop them. We let them know that we can do nothing; that they are left to their own manhood for protection.

I wish, Mr. Chairman, no misunderstanding in this matter. We will not be catchpoles for southern slaveholders. We will stand purified from the institution. No law will, no law can, compel us to catch the slaves. There is, there can be, no law which will force northern men, elevated and intelligent freemen, to turn out and give chase after runaway slaves. We have had demonstration of what I say lately in Wisconsin. There it was attempted to involve freemen in this slave-catching policy. You have seen the result. Popular sentiment is opposed to it. Our feelings of humanity, our principles of Christianity forbid it; our constitutional rights are opposed to it.

Mr. LETCHER. The gentleman has got through with all my queries to him, and he is now branching off on other subjects.

Mr. Chairman, I am very well satisfied that I gave the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GIDDINGS] the opportunity for the interruption which he has made. He has stated, with that frankness and that candor which he has uniformly exhibited when discussing this question, the sentiment and purposes of the North, so far as he has been able to learn it. We all know that he is well posted up as to the sentiment of the northern people, as to their purposes and objects, so far as any action, present or future, connected with slavery is concerned. He says they are for repealing the fugitive slave law; that they are in favor of allowing the South to recover, as they best can, the slaves who have run away from their owners when they have reached a free State. He says, also, that he is for that sort of legislation that will remove slavery from the District of Columbia, the navy-yards, and all other territory owned by the United States. He says that he is in favor of preventing the inter-State slave trade, and for confining slavery to the States where it now exists; that he is not disposed to allow slavery to go into any of the Territories of the United States; but that, on the contrary, he is determined, and the North are determined, to restore the Missouri compromise line, and to prohibit slavery forever from the Territory of Kansas, even though the people of that Territory may be unanimously in favor of its introduction.

Mr. GIDDINGS. I ask the gentleman to allow me to correct him in one particular. The gentleman speaks of my proposing to prevent the inter-State slave trade. That is not precisely my position. So far as the transportation of slaves from one slave State to another internally, is concerned, I have nothing to do. It is the coastwise slave trade upon the high seas that I propose to prevent. Congress have the right to make regulations for the navigation of the high seas, and I desire that this shall be one of them.

Mr. LETCHER. Very well; take it as it is now stated, and it presents a point which it is utterly impossible for the South to yield. It is pushing this interference to an issue where it would be disgraceful for the South to attempt to shun it, and she will not attempt to shun it. To accede to the terms thus dictated to her by the North, is basely to surrender all claim to her property, and to admit that wherever it goes beyond the limits of a slave State and enters a free State, it becomes, in the language of the gentleman from Ohio, "sovereign" in the State to which it may flee for the time being.

Mr. Chairman, under such circumstances as these, the gentleman from Ohio says he has no idea that I, or any one who comes from the South, would be inclined to sever the bonds of the Union—that we have talked too much upon that subject—and that we will submit hereafter, as we have always submitted heretofore. In other words, that there is not spirit enough in the South—that there is not manliness enough in the South—to stand by southern rights, to uphold southern interests, to protect southern property, and to defend slavery whenever it shall be assailed by our enemies, from any quarter whatever! Sir, do northern gentlemen entertain this opinion of us? Do they believe that we have been reduced to so abject a position, that we have not the courage to assert our rights, nor the power to defend our property? If such is their opinion, then their conduct in endeavoring to bring about a dissolution of the Union, by forcing upon us the measures indicated to-night, is precisely what might have been expected. They ought not to desire a longer connection with us. They will find, sooner or later, if these questions are pressed, that they have been sadly mistaken. If we cannot be considered as the equals of the gentleman from Ohio, and the equals of those whom he represents upon this floor; if the North are determined that we shall not have peace on this vital subject; if they are determined to press it at all hazards; regardless of consequences to themselves and to us, be it so. We shall have the agreeable reflection of knowing that we are not to blame; that the evil results cannot be charged upon us; that the North, and the North alone, are to blame. If the Union shall be dissolved, they cannot say we did it.

But the gentleman from Ohio says the North will not submit to have her rights interfered with. Sir, will the gentleman be good enough to tell us when and where the South has ever interfered, either directly or indirectly, with the rights of the North? When have we of the South endeavored to take away—to steal, by the aid of "underground railroad," by force or fraud, or by any other means—the property of the citizens of the North? Have we ever made such an attempt upon the constituents of the gentleman from Ohio? Never, sir, never! I believe the gentleman professes to hold to the doctrine of State rights, as declared in the resolutions of 1798 and 1799. I think the declaration he has made to-night is very much the same, in substance, with that made a few days ago by Mr. WILSON, the Massachusetts Senator, in the other end of the Capitol. These two gentlemen hold very much the same opinions in reference to State rights, slavery, the fugitive slave law, the Nebraska bill, and other questions of a kindred character. They both hold to the doctrine that the North shall declare the law, and the South shall have the glorious privilege of submission. The North is to make its demands, and the South is to yield a prompt obedience to those demands. The North is to prescribe its rules, and the South are to comply with them promptly and without a murmur.

Now, let me tell the gentleman from Ohio that, whatever he may think of the spirit of the South, he will find that there is a spirit there that will not submit to such requirements. I speak to the gentleman as coolly and calmly as I ever uttered a sentiment in my life, when I say that men of all parties in the South—Democrats, Whigs, by whatever name known, or by whatever organization they are united—will be found faithful in the hour of trial, to the rights, interests, honor, and institutions of the section of the country in which their lot is cast. They will never consent that the southern section of country shall occupy in this Union, that craven, base, and degraded position which he has assigned to us. Whenever that day shall come, the gentleman may rest assured that the South will be a unit. That all party lines and all party divisions will be obliterated. That there will be one party in the slave States known only as the defenders of southern rights. Whenever we must surrender our rights, or give up the Union, there will be no hesitation in making the selection. We can live without you. We can manage our own relations. We have the means among us that will give us wealth and power, and far better is it that we should go and live by ourselves than that we should submit to such unrighteous and iniquitous demands as have been asserted here to-night. The time has come when the South must prepare to defend her institutions against the aggressive spirit of the North.*

The gentleman thinks the South has no spirit. Sir, let him wait until the next session of Congress, when these measures shall be attempted to be carried out, and he will see of what stuff the South is made. He will see whether we shall quietly sit here, and whether our constituents will tolerate the idea of our quietly sitting here and submitting to such injuries as he has proposed to inflict upon us. The sunny South is our home. It is the land that gave us birth. It is the land in which is deposited the bones of our ancestors. Within the bosom of my own State sleep Jefferson, and Henry, and Madison, and hosts of others whose deeds have illustrated and adorned the annals of our country. And, sir, shall we permit our enemies to invade the sanctity of those homes and those firesides? No, sir; the South will be protected and defended by her sons, at whatever cost, and you will find that there is spirit enough left to repel any attempt at interference with our rights or our interests.

Now, sir, there is still one other point to which I desire to allude. I wish to know from the gentleman from Ohio whether he indorses the sentiments contained in the correspondence which appeared a few days ago in the American Organ of this city.

Mr. GIDDINGS. Will the gentleman be a little more explicit? I do not know precisely to what he alludes?

Mr. LETCHER. I mean the correspondence between Mr. Ellis and Mr. Wilson, the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. GIDDINGS. I indorse that part of it written by Mr. Wilson, fully. I do not know much about that of Mr. Ellis.

Mr. LETCHER. Do you indorse all the sentiments expressed by Mr. Wilson?

Mr. GIDDINGS. I do indorse all the sentiments expressed in that correspondence, so far as to say, that the Federal Government has no power of interference with the existence of slavery in the States. My friend must know that I have laid down that doctrine in express terms, but a little more in detail than it is contained in that letter.

Mr. LETCHER. Well, let me try the gentleman on another point a little more explicitly.

Mr. GIDDINGS. A moment if you please. What we intend to do is to purify this Government from the institution of slavery, and leave that institution entirely with the States.

Mr. LETCHER. Upon the principle, I suppose, that, as we inherit it from the North, their children feel the stain of it and want to relieve their ancestors from it.

Mr. GIDDINGS. Well, I can go into that question if the gentleman wishes it.

Mr. LETCHER. Stop a moment. There is another question which I wish to put to the gentleman. Suppose he had been interrogated on the question of slavery, and the power of the Government over slavery, what would have been his answer?

Mr. GIDDINGS. I do not believe I should have done it better than Mr. Wilson.

Mr. LETCHER. Would you not have gone a little further than he does?

Mr. GIDDINGS. I might have gone more into detail. But if I had undertaken to do it in a brief and comprehensive manner, I should probably have done it in nearly the same terms as he has done. His letter contains everything that I have said to-night, only I have elaborated and gone more into detail.

Mr. LETCHER. I should like to know whether the gentleman from Ohio and Mr. Wilson both belong to the same organization—the Know-Nothings?

Mr. GIDDINGS. No man will impute that to me. I know something. [Laughter.] I have known enough, at all events, to keep me here for twenty years. [Renewed laughter.]

Mr. LETCHER. I know the gentleman is not practically a Know-Nothing. I know that very well. But whether he is theoretically a Know-Nothing, and practically upon the same platform with Mr. Wilson with regard to the slavery question, is what I want to know.

Mr. GIDDINGS. My friend, I suppose, asks me if I belong to that political or moral organization called Know-Nothing in the common language of the day. I can say to my friend, that, individually, I "know nothing" about that organization whatever, either by precept, example, or anything else, excepting, of course, what I have seen in the public press. [Laughter.]

Mr. LETCHER. I find that nobody has any personal knowledge about that organization. They all "know nothing" about it. [Renewed laughter.] And I have yet to see the first man upon this floor—although it has been proclaimed that a number of seats in this Hall are occupied by Know-Nothings—who will acknowledge that he is one. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. Banks] could not be screwed up to it the other day, although every man in this House would swear that the gentleman is a member of the order. [Laughter.]

Mr. BANKS. No one asked me the question.

Mr. LETCHER. Well, then, I ask it now. Will the gentleman answer me?

Mr. BANKS. What?

Mr. LETCHER. Do you belong to the order of Know-Nothings?

Mr. GIDDINGS. One moment, if you please. I want to answer the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. LETCHER. Oh, I cannot get anything out of you. [Laughter.]

Mr. GIDDINGS. I only want to say that I do not belong to any organization of that kind, whatsoever.

Mr. LETCHER. Very well. That is frank.

Mr. GIDDINGS. I have no knowledge of any such organization.

Mr. LETCHER. Now, let me try the gentleman from Massachusetts. Does he belong to the organization called Know-Nothing, that has been the subject of comment by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. Ruffin] to-night?

Mr. BANKS. I belong to an organization—not that I know that it is called by the name of Know-Nothing—but that answers the description that is generally understood by that name in my own town. Nobody has asked me the question before. I have never declined to answer it, and nobody has "screwed me up to it."

Mr. LETCHER. Then I have gotten one anti-slavery gentlemen here to acknowledge the corn. [Great laughter.] He is the first. Now, many others are said to be here, and I should like to know of the gentleman from Massachusetts, since he acknowledges himself to be a high priest in the organization, how many of his followers are members of this House?

Mr. BANKS. I do not know one.

Mr. LETCHER. It is very remarkable that the gentleman should be the head of a family, and know none of his children—is it not? [Laughter.] I take it that the gentleman is about as nearly a practical Know-Nothing as you could well get. [Renewed laughter.] I have heard it said that it is one of the rules of this organization to know nothing, to know nobody, to say nothing, to hear all they can, to retail all they hear, and to make the best use of all they hear, and I think, after the last answer of the gentleman from Massachusetts, the House will have no difficulty in arriving at the conclusion that the party has been pretty accurately described.

Now, let me call attention to another fact in connection with this matter. Here is Senator Wilson, who is said to be a Know-Nothing. That is a conceded fact, as I understand. I take it the gentleman from Massachusetts knows the fact.

Mr. BANKS. I do not.

Mr. LETCHER. Does the gentleman mean to deny that he and Mr. Wilson are brethren in the same organization, sailing under the same colors, and struggling for the same ends?

Mr. BANKS. Mr. Wilson and myself have long been struggling for a change in the politics of Massachusetts. Whether he is a member of the organization to which the gentleman alludes, I never knew, and have no knowledge any more than from what the gentleman says is the general report.

Mr. LETCHER. Then there is a general report to that effect, and it is most remarkable that gentlemen living in the same State, one the leader of the Know-Nothings from his State in this House, and the other occupying the same position in the Senate, and that each should not know whether the other belongs to the organization! [Laughter.] It does strike me as most extraordinary that there should be an organization which they say is sweeping over the country from North to South and from East to West, obliterating all old party lines, breaking up all old party organizations, burying all "old fogy" politicians and demagogues, and building up all things anew, and which is to give us a sort of political millenium, and yet of these two men of political prominence, residing in the same State, having the same political objects in view, and struggling for the same political ends—the relief of their State from the power of the party that has hitherto controlled it, under the lead of Webster and Everett, and yet neither knows whether the other belongs to the organization!

Mr. GIDDINGS. Let me put one interrogatory to the gentleman?

Mr. LETCHER. Not just now.

Mr. GIDDINGS. One short question only.

Mr. LETCHER. I have no doubt the gentleman from Ohio feels sympathy for his brother Abolitionist from Massachusetts, and would like to get him out of this scrape.

Mr. GIDDINGS. I answered your question.

Mr. LETCHER. Yes; the gentleman answered me frankly enough.

Mr. GIDDINGS. Then let me ask if you are a Know-Nothing? [Laughter.]

Mr. LETCHER. No, sir; neither practically, theoretically, morally, socially, or in any way.

Mr. GIDDINGS. That is the usual answer. [Roars of laughter.]

Mr. LETCHER. Let me say to the gentleman more than that: that whenever I shall join a society, whenever I shall get my own consent to join a political organization, that I shall not have the manliness to say I am a member of, I trust I shall not be here, nor in any other position where confidence shall be reposed in me by a just and generous constituency, such as I represent here. [Cries of "Good!"]

But let me get back to the point I was discussing. Here, then, is Mr. Wilson, admittedly elected to the Senate of the United States by a Know-Nothing Legislature—one almost unani-

* The following extract from the Richmond Whig, February 27, 1855, shows that I am not mistaken in the temper and patriotism of the South; all our people will be true:

"We have thus given only a brief sketch of the debate last Friday, in order to let the southern people know its true purport and character. It is useless to say that when these doctrines of Wilson and Wade are attempted to be carried out by Congress, there will be an end of the Union. The South will not submit to such Abolition incendiarism. If they shall succeed in their purposes, it will, indeed, be a dark day for the country. Upon them, however, and those who sustain them, will rest the responsibility and all the consequences. As much as we love and revere the Union, we had rather see it shivered into a thousand pieces than submit to the degradation which Seward and his vile confederates propose to heap upon the South. It is for them, not for the South, to determine whether the Union, hallowed in so many respects and for so many reasons, shall survive or die."

mously so. There was one lonely Democrat there, I believe—the only poor soul who could muster votes enough to get into the body, (laughter)—and there were some four or five Whigs, but the remaining four or five hundred all belonged to this organization. Is it not so? I pause for a reply. Now, I have heard that none of those men are bogus Know-Nothings, in the popular acceptation of the term, but that they are all of the real genuine stripe. Can the gentleman from Massachusetts tell me how that is?

Mr. BANKS. I cannot say.

Mr. LETCHER. The gentleman "cannot say!" Well, sir, I take it that the people of the South will want to know before they are disposed to go the full length in this matter.

Well, let us come still nearer home. There is the State of Pennsylvania, in which an election for Senator was to take place to-day. There is a strong party of Know-Nothings in the Legislature of that State. We know that they have been in trouble for some considerable time in regard to the election of a Senator, and we have seen in the papers which reached the city this morning the letter of General Cameron, their candidate, announcing his platform of principles, and it is the identical platform which has been laid down here to-night by the gentlemen from New York, [Mr. GOODWIN,] and the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GIDDINGS.] Now, how is it, that with an organization professing to be national, and to have no other object in view but the preservation of the Union, the perpetuity of our institutions, and the glory, honor, and prosperity of our common country, that whenever they are called upon to elect officers, their candidates come in on anti-slavery platforms? How does that accord with the principle of nationality that is claimed for the organization?. How does it harmonize with that devotion to the Union, that anxious desire to preserve all our institutions, to build up our trade, and to advance everything that is the common property and the common glory of all the citizens of this great nation? How do gentlemen undertake to explain these facts? Yet so it is. That is the result. Here is the New York election. Here is the Pennsylvania senatorial election. Here is the Pennsylvania congressional election, where even the Nebraskaites and the Democratic anti-Nebraskaites were swept down in one common wreck. Here is the congressional election in New York, which they say, was brought about by Know-Nothings.

Mr. WITTE, (interrupting.) Will the gentleman from Virginia allow me to make a remark which bears upon this point of his speech?

Mr. LETCHER. Certainly.

Mr. WITTE. It is this: that there is not one single member from Pennsylvania who will come to this House, in the next Congress, for the first time, as an anti-Nebraska man, who has not been elected by a combination of what there is of the Abolition element in our State, with Know-Nothingism and anti-Nebraskaism.

Mr. LETCHER. I am very much obliged to the gentleman for his information.

Mr. WITTE. I desire that point to be clearly understood, because I do not wish the old Commonwealth to be misrepresented, and the title "Democracy" to be prostituted. I want it to be distinctly understood that every member not a Democrat, who comes here for the first time in the next Congress has obtained his seat by an unholy coalition between the three elements which I have designated: Abolitionism—what there is of it in the State—anti-Nebraskaism, and Know-Nothingism.

Mr. FLORENCE. With a sprinkling of Maine lawism.

Mr. LETCHER. I am very much obliged to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. WITTE,] for the facts he has furnished. Now, sir, let us look at some of the other States. Here is the State of Ohio, for instance. Will there be a solitary Nebraska man from that State in the next Congress, because, if I understood the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. CAMPBELL,] some time ago, he said there would not be a Nebraska man from that State in the next Congress?

Mr. CAMPBELL. Not one, thank God!

Mr. LETCHER. "Not one, thank God!!" Put it down, sir, as the gentleman uttered it. When you come to the State of Indiana, how many do you think are left there to tell the tale?

A MEMBER. Two.

Mr. LETCHER. Mr. MILLER and Mr. ENGLISH are the only two left in that State. What brought about these results there? Was it the same thing as in the State of Pennsylvania? Was it brought about by Know-Nothing influence? Was it the same thing which has brought new members and a Senator here from the State of Illinois? Was it the same thing which brought so many new members here from the State of Wisconsin? And these, I believe, embrace about all the elections, save that of Massachusetts, which have occurred since last fall.

A MEMBER. Michigan.

Another MEMBER. New Jersey.

Mr. LETCHER. Yes, there is Michigan. I had neglected that, and New Jersey, where the same result is effected. Here then comes, last of all, the State of Massachusetts. She sends an entire new delegation, I believe, with the exception of two. What was the cause of that change, sir? Were not the gentlemen who are now here strong enough in their opposition to Southern institutions and to Southern rights, to secure the retention of their position? Did they differ in respect to the fugitive slave law, or on any other question from the gentlemen who will appear here in the next Congress? The only difference between them sir, is, I imagine, that those who come here in the next Congress come fresh from the people, come with all the feelings, with all the animosities, with all the prejudices which have been engendered by this combination in Massachusetts, and, therefore, with a more bitter and more determined spirit to accomplish their purpose, cost what it may. The result in Massachusetts is an admitted Know-Nothing triumph, and in many of the other States I am informed that the Democratic party was defeated by the power and influence of this new organization. I do not charge that the southern Know-Nothings sympathize with the views of northern Know-Nothings on slavery.

[Here the hammer fell.]

SPEECH OF HON. L. D. CAMPBELL,

OF OHIO,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

February 28, 1855.

In reply to Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia.

Mr. CAMPBELL said:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: It is now past ten o'clock in the evening of one of the expiring days of the Thirty-Third Congress. I rejoice, as the country rejoices, that we so nearly approach the hour of its dissolution. The history of this Congress, I fear, sir, will prove to the future that we have done more of evil than of good. I look back in vain upon the pages of its Journals for proof that we have done much that is either calculated to promote the great interests of our own nation, or the cause of humanity at large. It is not my purpose now to review our acts in detail. It is enough to say that when this Congress and the present Administration came into power under a pledge to economy, it found our National Treasury full to overflowing. If measures enough have not already passed to drain it, means will be provided before next Sabbath morning, not only to draw from the sub-Treasury vaults the last dollar of the people, but such, sir, I predict, as will compel the Executive to call upon the incoming reform Congress to issue Treasury notes to enable it to raise the means necessary to carry on the Government.

Again, sir, when we were first convened, that sectional strife which had so often disturbed the national harmony and endangered the perpetuity of the Union had happily subsided, and the whole country rested upon the assurance that it had secured its long-desired repose. Sir, I cannot, without deep emotion, again call attention to the condition of public sentiment produced by that reckless act of this party, which, regardless of plighted faith, and defiant of popular will, repealed the Missouri compromise. We came here full of hopes of future harmony—we separate with hearts full of fear that the storm which the uncalled-for Nebraska act has occasioned will not be allayed without serious results to the great interests of our common country. If it brings woe to our people, let this Administration and its party be held responsible, because in every branch of the Government they have held unlimited power.

Mr. Chairman, I propose to reply to the last speech of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. STEPHENS] upon the repeal of the Missouri compromise. There are some remarkable incidents connected with the controversy between us which call upon me to do so. That controversy originated in the consideration of the bill proposed by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. MACE] to exclude slavery from Kansas and Nebraska. When I entered this Hall on the 14th day of December, the gentleman from Georgia had the floor, and was discussing its merits. I had no expectation of embarking in the discussion until, when near the close of his speech, he undertook to prove, in substance, that the labor of a slave in Georgia was more successful than the labor of a freeman in Ohio. Sir, this proposition, in such a crisis as this, involved a principle worthy the consideration of any statesman in any civilized land upon the face of the earth.

But there were other considerations which prompted me to meet the gentleman in controverting so startling an assumption. I had left behind me in my native Buckeye-land, where the foot of slavery never made its imprint, brothers, kindred, true and trusty friends, laboring freemen in every branch of industry. I should have been recreant to my duty here, false to every impulse of my nature, and treacherous to the great cause of human freedom, to have permitted the gentleman's comparison and statistics to remain unanswered. I obtained the floor after he had spoken his hour without any interruption from me, and proceeded to reply. I yielded to him in my hour, thirty-three times, as appears by the record revised by himself, and I afterwards submitted the reporter's notes to him for revision, and such additions as he chose to make explanatory of his views. Under this state of facts, I had reason to believe the controversy was closed. But a month afterwards, the gentleman again took the floor and delivered a premeditated and elaborately prepared assault upon my reply, charging among other matters, that I had sized his argument to my capacity to reply to his! Sir, it is a matter of indifference to me as to how high an estimate the gentleman may place upon his "argument," or how low he may scale my "capacity" to meet him; this House and the country will give to each of us our just level. When I arose to correct one of his statements, with haughty mien, he replied to me that my interruption had no pertinence, and then, again, he said "Be brief, sir, I have no time to spare." May I not, under such circumstances, suggest that the gentleman discovered that he could not "size" his courtesy in debate by the extent of the task he sought to perform, in assuming that slave labor was superior to free labor!

Again, sir, the honorable gentleman would seem to demand for his statistics and arguments great force, for he told us he was "never wrong." I cannot set up for myself such infallibility! I am often wrong; but in this contest I feel a consciousness that the right is with me, and until I am satisfied of my error, neither contemptuous contortions of countenance, violent gesticulations, nor high-toned annunciation can move me one hair's breadth from my position.

Again, sir, the honorable gentleman seems to assume for himself a very elevated position, and to assign to me a very humble one. In alluding to our controversy of December 14th, he compares me to the "wild boy of the forest, with bow and arrow, attempting to shoot into the moon!" Without questioning the gentleman's good taste, I submit to the stigma of the "wild boy of the forest." There is quite as much truth as poetry in it, for bears were very plenty and, in boyhood, it was occasionally my lot to traverse the forest paths in night's dark hours, when the wolf howled behind me. And, Mr. Chairman, I shall not controvert the claim which the gentleman's figure sets up—that he is the veritable man in the moon! I stood at my desk when the gentleman delivered his speech, as I am here now, ready to "shoot at folly as it flies," whether to the green cheese of the moon, or to the sweet potatoes of Georgia!

"Around the hut where I was born,"

"With bended bow, and quiver full of arrows,"

The honorable gentleman is adroit in his effort to escape the consequences of the issues he had the temerity to present to this House. I shall bring him back to them in due time, after disposing of the outside matters he has introduced. I quoted him as saying "the South asks nothing," and he charges me, therefore, with "putting words in his mouth which he did not utter!"! It is due that I should give the gentleman the benefit of his language as published in his first speech as revised by himself. He said:

"But when did we ever come up and ask any aid from the Government of the United States? The constant prayer of the South to you has been to stay your hands. All that we ask of you is, keep your hands out of our pockets. That is all that the South asks, and we do not get even that."

Now, sir, may I not ask whether the gentleman's complaint has not for its foundation a mere quibble? The substance of his charge is, that the free States have been robbing the South. In what manner has this alleged plunder been perpetrated through the General Government? Let us briefly examine.

Have we robbed you through our tariff laws? In 1816, Mr. Calhoun was the advocate of a protective tariff. The free States never demanded protection until, under the system proposed by the South, they had been induced to invest, in permanent manufactories, buildings, and machinery, their capital. Then they claimed that, in good faith, the system should be continued. In 1824–'28 the system was advocated by southern statesmen, such as Jackson, Benton, Eaton, Richard M. Johnson, and others. Besides, sir, every branch of southern industry has been as fully protected by all our tariff laws as those of the free States. There is no injustice in this branch of Federal legislation. If there is, I challenge the gentleman to show it.

Have we robbed you through our improvement laws? I assert, without the fear of contradiction from any source, that in all the bills that have ever passed Congress for the improvement of rivers and harbors, the slave States have received a much greater amount from the National Treasury, according to their Federal representation, than the free States. Such was the case last session. It is so now. In the future, you will not complain if, in this branch of legislation, we say, "keep your hands out of our pockets!"

Have we robbed you in expenditures for acquiring additional territory? On a former occasion I asserted that the free States had never asked for the acquisition of new territories, and attributed to southern demands all the acquisitions since the organization of the Government, to wit: Louisiana, Florida, Texas, California, Utah, and New Mexico, and the Mesilla valley. These annexations, the result of southern influence, including the war with Mexico, (the fruit of annexation,) cost the Federal Government more than two hundred millions of dollars, and furnished a legitimate item in reply to the charge of robbery.

The gentleman goes into an elaborate calculation to prove that a portion of this territory is in northern latitudes. The truth of this proposition does not affect my point. The acquisitions are all the result of southern demands upon the Federal Government, the purpose being to strengthen the political power of slavery, which has always been successful. The repeal of the Missouri compromise, and the admission of slavery into Kansas and Nebraska, consummate this policy of the slave States; because our national history shows that no free State has ever yet been formed from territory from which slavery had not been positively excluded by law.

Have we robbed you through the postal arrangements of the General Government? Look, sir, into the last page of the President's message and accompanying documents upon our desks. We have here the figures of an annual robbery. The figures stand thus:

Slave States, cost of mail transportation	$2,087,225
Slave States, postages, &c., paid	1,487,984
Deficit	$599,241
Free States, postages, &c., paid	$4,393,056
Free States, cost of mail transportation, &c.	2,381,877
Overpaid	$2,011,179

The free States pay more than $2,000,000 above the cost of their mails, whilst your slave States (Georgia being a leading defaulter) are annually nearly $600,000 behind. Our people are taxed for the letters you receive, and the day is not far off when they will say to you, through the solemn forms of law, "keep your hands out of our pockets!"

Mr. Chairman, the gentleman's last speech discloses a purpose to evade the issues of our first controversy. I am, therefore, induced to follow him briefly in his filibustering wanderings to Cuba. He wants to annex that rich island. Inasmuch as Spain will not sell it, he seems to propose that our people should become land pirates, and take it through the process of throat cutting. In reference to our objections to his ideas of acquisition, he says: "I see none but an obstinate, fixed, and blind dogmatical nonsense!" And in another part of his speech he says:

"My record may stand as it is made up. I have no desire to change or modify it in the least; not even to cross a t or dot an i. By it, as it stands, I am willing to abide while living, and by it to abide when dead. It was not made for a day, or for an election, but for all time to come."

Mr. Chairman, the honorable gentleman has called attention to his record, with all the solemn forms of a "last will and testament!" I had occasion, on the 14th of December, to look into his record, and will now take up other parts of it, with a view to ascertain whether he had not as well add a codicil, by way of explanation. He seems to regard my argument as deficient in power compared to his own. I choose, therefore, to reply to his late demonstration in favor of taking Cuba whilst Spain refuses to sell it, by the forcible remarks which his record shows he made in this Hall on a former and similar occasion. I read from the Congressional Globe, volume 19, page 163. During our war with Mexico, an obstacle to a treaty of peace was presented in the refusal of Mexico to dispose of her territory. On the 2d of February, 1848, the honorable gentleman gave utterance to the following noble sentiments. He seems now to repudiate them. I have a right to appropriate them to my present purpose, and to adopt them as my own. By doing so, I have assurance that I quote authority that will command from the honorable gentleman more attention than the offspring of my own intellect.

"The sine qua non for peace in the instructions to Mr. Trist, was to take New Mexico and California, and pay $15,000,000 or $20,000,000. No man can be mistaken. The reason that peace was not made, was because Mexico was unwilling to sell a portion of her country; and the avowed object in now continuing it, is to compel and force her to make the surrender, or to take the whole of it.

"Sir, I take this earliest opportunity of saying that I shall never tax my constituents for any such object. If they wish to contribute their substance to sustain a policy so odious and detestable, so entirely at war with the most sacred principles upon which their own Government is founded, they must send some other person here to lay the taxes. I never shall do it.

"The President assumes, if I understand his position, that the honor and interest of this country require us to make this demand of Mexico. Sir, I wholly dissent from any such doctrine. The honor of this country does not and cannot require us to force and compel the people of any other to sell theirs. I have, I trust, as high a regard for the national honor as any man. It is the brightest gem in the chaplet of a nation's glory; and there is nothing of which I am prouder than the high character for honor this country has acquired throughout the civilized world—that code of honor which was established by Washington and the men of the Revolution, and which rests upon truth, justice, and honesty, which is the offspring of virtue and integrity, and which is seen in the length and breadth of our land, in all the evidences of art, and civilization, and moral advancement, and everything that tends to elevate, dignify, and ennoble man.

"This is the honor of my admiration, and it is made of 'sterner,' purer, nobler 'stuff' than that aggressive and degrading, yea, odious principle now avowed, of waging war against a neighboring people to compel them to sell their country. Who is here so base as to be willing, under any circumstances, to sell his country? For myself, I can only say, if the last funeral pile of liberty were lighted, I would mount it and expire in its flames before I would be coerced by any power, however great and strong, to sell or surrender the land of my home, the place of my nativity, and the graves of my sires! Sir, the principle is not only dishonorable, but infamous. As the Representative upon this floor of a high-minded and honorable constituency, I repeat, that the principle of waging war against a neighboring people to compel them to sell their country, is not only dishonorable, but disgraceful and infamous. What! shall it be said that American honor aims at nothing higher than land, than the ground on which we tread? Do we look no higher in our aspirations for honor, than do the soulless brutes? Shall we disavow the similitude of our Maker, and disgrace the very name of man? Tell it not to the world. Let not such an aspersion and reproach rest upon our name. I have heard of nations whose honor could be satisfied with gold, that glittering dust which is so precious in the eyes of some; but never did I expect to live to see the day when the Executive of this country should announce that our honor was such a loathsome, beastly thing, that it could not be satisfied with any achievements in arms, however brilliant and glorious, but must feed on earth, gross, vile dirt; and require even a prostrate foe to be robbed of mountain rocks and desert plains. I have no such notions of honor; and I have quite as little opinion of that policy which would spend fifty or a hundred millions of dollars in compelling the Mexicans to take fifteen or twenty millions for New Mexico and California, on the score of public interest."

Mr. Chairman, further back in the gentleman's "record," which is to "stand as it is made up," I find wholesome suggestions from him, pertinent to his present proposition to take Cuba. In vol. 16, page 950, of the Congressional Globe, his record shows that he said to the American people, from his desk in this Hall:

"We can only properly enlarge by voluntary accessions, and should only attempt to act upon our neighbors by setting them a good example."

Again, he repudiates filibustering for other nations' territories:

"Fields of blood and carnage may make men brave and heroic, but seldom tend to make nations either good, virtuous, or great."

Still further back in the pages of the gentleman's "record," by which he abides, "dead or alive," he spoke well on the proposition of annexing Texas. On the 25th January, 1845, (Congressional Globe, vol. 14, page 190,) he is reported as follows:

"Much as he regarded the luster of the 'lone star,' (and he would let it gleam on,) he admired the brilliant galaxy of the present Confederacy of our glorious old twenty-six States, as they now existed, more. And rather than that star, shooting from its orbit and coming into ours, should produce confusion, he should say let it gleam on alone, and remain where it was."

It will be remembered that during the pendency of the Mexican war the question was raised here, whether we should exact from Mexico any of her territory as a condition of peace. On the 22d of January, 1847, (Cong. Globe, vol. 17, p. 240,) he offered in this House the following resolution:

"Be it therefore resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the present war with Mexico 'is not waged with a view to conquest,' or the dismemberment of that Republic by the acquisition of any portion of her territory."

And prior to this resolve (June 16, 1846, Cong. Globe, vol. 15, p. 982) he denounced acquisitions of territory:

"As to the objects of the war, he inquired what it was the intention of the Administration to do? Was it to pursue the conquest of Mexico? Was it that our soldiers might 'revel in the halls of the Montezumas?' Was it that we might acquire the Californias and all the mining districts as well as the capital of Mexico itself? If so, he was opposed to it. He declared himself, in advance, in favor of peace so soon as peace could be honorably obtained."

The gentleman's pertinacity against acquisitions of territory was most remarkable. His was the firmness of the "noblest Roman of them all." On the 12th of February, 1847, (Cong. Globe, vol. 17, p. 401,) he said, in reference to conquests and the war with Mexico:

"If there were any other object, it was for the direct and settled purpose of conquest; and that he believed to have been its main object. He declared himself opposed to the conquest and dismemberment of Mexico, either for the expenses of the war or for the satisfaction of indemnity of our citizens."

He wants Cuba now. He would have our Government violate or abrogate our solemn treaty with Spain, and turn out its reckless adventurers and speculators to aid the "oppressed Cubans!" Mr. Chairman, there never lived a greater tyrant than Santa Anna. Our war with his Government closed with the treaty by which we acquired the rich mines of California and the vast Territories of Utah and New Mexico. How ran the current of the gentleman's sympathies for the "oppressed" of tyranny then? What were his views of an extension of our domain? On the 19th of February, 1849, (Cong. Globe, vol. 20, p. 557,) the following resolution was submitted to this House by one of its members from my own State, [Mr. Schenck:]

"That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized and instructed to enter forthwith into negotiations with the Government of the Republic of Mexico for the surrender to said Republic of all the territories known as New Mexico and Upper California, or so much thereof as lies west of the Rio Grande, of any title thereto which was acquired by the United States under the fifth article of the treaty between the United States and Mexico, made and concluded at Guadalupe Hidalgo, on the 2d day of February, A. D. 1848," &c.

The vote stood as follows:

"YEAS—Messrs. Ashmun, Cranston, Crowel, Fisher, Giddings, Henry, Horace Mann, Palfrey, Schenck, Stephens, and Toombs—11."

But, sir, I must leave the gentleman voting with his "Abolition" friends, and pass from this branch of his "record." Necessity does not require further explorations. I said, on the 14th December, when I interrogated him on the constitutionality of the Wilmot proviso, that I had confidence in him as a constitutional lawyer. I repeat it now, in connection with the question of our power to annex territories. On the 25th January, 1845, (Cong. Globe, vol. 14, page 190,) Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia, thus defines his position:

"He denied that the Constitution gives to Congress any power, either expressed or implied, to acquire foreign territory; or to the treaty making power the right to acquire territory for the purpose of extending the Union. He affirmed that the power given to Congress to admit new States was limited to the then territory of the Union."

Now, sir, I dismiss the points of the gentleman's last speech, and I leave the "record" which he has given us for all time and eternity, too. I cannot learn from it in what way we can annex Cuba, if he acquires it, either by purchase or by filibustering, without violating the Constitution both he and I have sworn to support. Glancing thus hastily over its pages to learn wisdom on the great points of our power to annex territories, and then to exclude slavery from them, one might very naturally say:

"Man's a strange animal, and makes use
Of his own nature, and the various arts,
And likes particularly to produce
Some new experiments to show his——parts!"

He presented an argument, in favor of taking Cuba, to the people of Ohio, which it is proper I should notice in leaving the subject. He suggests that we are now required to pay heavy duties at Havana, under the laws of Spain, on Ohio produce, which would not be required if the island was annexed. I wish to say to the gentleman, that whatever may be the code of national or individual morals in Georgia, in Ohio we regard American faith as higher than the profits on flour, and principle dearer to us than the value of pork! The Ohio farmer will not consent to cut the throat, or shoot out the brains of a Spanish subject in Cuba, on the gentleman's promise that he shall make two shillings more of profit on his pig!

Mr. Chairman, I propose now to go back to the original issues which the gentleman presented in his first speech. They involved: 1, the constitutionality; 2, the expediency of excluding slavery from our national Territories by an act of Congress. I have no desire to discuss self-evident propositions, or those that are admitted by my adversary. Slavery is the antagonist of liberty. In the abstract, it is admitted to be a wrong, hence remarks on this point are needless. Upon the question of the power of Congress over Territories, under the Constitution, there has been ground for dispute; but on the 14th of December the gentleman certainly united in my repudiation of the doctrine that we should give to the people of a Territory unlimited sovereignty. He denounced what is termed "squatter sovereignty," thereby making an issue with those who aided him to pass the Nebraska bill, and not with me. On these points I pass him over to those who went for that bill on the ground that it secured to the people of the Territories the right of self-government, and the privilege of "regulating all their affairs in their own way."

I held that Congress had constitutional power to exclude slavery, and sought to fortify myself by the action of our great statesmen, as well as the opinion of the gentleman. To be sure, sir, he was rather twistical in the course of my cross-examination, and said that he had never expressed an opinion on this point, either here or before his constituents. I resorted, then, to that "record," and proved that he had exercised the power, and voted—in the Texas resolutions—to deprive the people of a Territory of the right to hold slaves, and to withhold from them the privilege of tolerating slavery under any State constitution they might adopt. My high estimate of the gentleman's integrity and ability forbade me from supposing that he had willfully violated the Constitution he had sworn to support; and I assumed that he agreed with me that Congress had power to legislate for the exclusion of slavery from Territories. He did not dispute the assumption. Sir, I shall hold him to the point I established. He is a distinguished leader among southern members. His admissions have not been denied on this floor by southern members. Two months have elapsed, and no southern newspaper that I have seen has denied their correctness. I have, therefore, the right now to assume—and shall assume—that the South, and especially members from the State of Georgia, unite with me, as the gentleman did, in acknowledging the constitutional right of Congress to exclude slavery from all the Territories of the Federal Government.

Mr. BAILEY, of Georgia. I have seen the liberality of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. CAMPBELL] in extending, on being interrupted, the privilege to explain and to answer. He knows well enough that on the floor I have never sought to intrude on the time or attention of any one; but from reference having been made to Georgia, I ask him to allow me the privilege of speaking briefly on this subject.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I have much to say and but little time. If the gentleman repudiates the positions of his colleague, he can say so in a word, and place himself right on the record.

Mr. BAILEY. I wish to say that I not only repudiate that position of my colleague, [Mr. STEPHENS,] but a great many other positions of his.

[Mr. BAILEY proceeded to define his position at length, stating that he believed the people of Georgia also repudiated the positions of his colleague, [Mr. STEPHENS.] Mr. B.'s speech will be found on pages 327–330.

Mr. CAMPBELL. On this branch of the subject I have no longer any controversy with the gentleman's colleague, [Mr. STEPHENS.] We seem to have come together on the great question which underlies the whole difficulty, the constitutional power of Congress to exclude slavery from Territories. He joins me, too, in denouncing the doctrine of "squatter sovereignty," as asserted by the friends of the Nebraska bill. If the gentleman [Mr. BAILEY] joins issue with us, I transfer his colleague [Mr. STEPHENS] to him. They may have their contest before the people of Georgia.

Mr. SEWARD, of Georgia. I ask the gentleman to allow me a moment.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Do you indorse the positions of your colleague, [Mr. STEPHENS?]

Mr. SEWARD. No sir; I do not.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Then I turn him over to you also. Fight it out in Georgia. I carry on no controversy with your colleague further than we may disagree.

Mr. SEWARD here expressed his regret that his colleague [Mr. STEPHENS] had not defined his position more promptly, and proceeded to define his own position, closing with the remark that in a particular contingency in reference to the right of slavery in Territories, &c., he was willing to see this Government rent asunder.

Mr. CAMPBELL. All these threats of dissolving the Union since the repeal of the Missouri compromise have become, in the free States, "stale, flat, and unprofitable!" They do not frighten anybody. Much as our people may have loved the Union, they have pretty generally made up their minds for the future, if this Union is to be perpetuated, it shall not be for the purpose of extending slavery into free Territories. Southern gentlemen may stick a pin there!

I have no design to interfere in any contest these honorable gentlemen from Georgia may get up among themselves. They may "regulate their domestic institution in their own way," and I will look on with entire complacency. The honorable gentleman to whom I reply, [Mr. STEPHENS,] has substantially indorsed my positions as to the constitutional power of Congress to exclude slavery from Territories. I have proved by his "record" that we have no power to sustain his proposition to annex Cuba, as he now proposes, without violating the Constitution we have solemnly sworn to support.

Mr. WRIGHT, of Mississippi. If the gentleman denies the power of Congress to annex Cuba, I ask him to explain his resolution of last session for the annexation of the Canadas, &c.

Mr. CAMPBELL. The gentleman from Mississippi cannot involve me in an inconsistency. My record, here and at home, is straightforward for the promotion of freedom, without proposing to violate the Constitution, or the rights of the South. The resolution to which he alludes, submitted by me at the last session, simply authorized negotiations to be opened, to ascertain on what terms we might acquire the British Provinces in North America, in an honest and peaceful way. It merely presented the inquiry, "What do you ask for them?" without committing Congress to an agreement to pay the price that might be demanded, or to annexation. It was a resolution of inquiry merely. Besides, Mr. Chairman, I thought that, inasmuch as the slave States had so often found power under the Constitution to annex the Territories of Louisiana, Florida, Texas, California, Utah, New Mexico, and the Messilla valley—wading through rivers of blood, and expending millions upon millions from the National Treasury to accomplish their purposes—and are even now willing to have a war with Spain for the acquisition of Cuba, to increase the slave power of the Union, we, of the free States, might venture to make an honest, quiet, and peaceful inquiry as to the terms upon which we might extend our area of freedom northward. Mr. Jefferson declared the acquisition of Louisiana to be an act beyond the powers of the Constitution. The gentleman from Georgia agreed with him, as I have shown. The acquisition of Louisiana was justified only on that principle known as the "higher law" of national necessity. Every acquisition since that finds no other authority than in the principles of that "higher law." My position is, that if the Constitution justifies acquisitions southward for slavery, it justifies them northward for freedom! If the slave States act upon a principle of "higher law" than the Constitution, the free States (being equal copartners in the firm known as "The Union") have a right to adopt it as the rule of their action. And, Mr. Chairman, I intend to assert that right. The Constitution was formed with an implied understanding that no additional territory was to be annexed, and no new slave States admitted into this Union. The spirit of the instrument has oftentimes been violated by the friends of slavery; their "strict construction" arguments are only advanced when they fear the onward march of freedom.

Mr. Chairman, gentlemen apply the taunt of "Abolitionist" on this floor, and seek to effect their purposes by engendering prejudices. For my own part, I have to say that I have always hitherto been a Whig. Now, that the Whig party seems to have been numbered with the "things that were and are not," and the faithless Democracy has gone down below the point to which it is supposed the arm of resurrection can reach, I shall prefer to have my position known, now and hereafter, by the principles I may avow. I shall hold myself independent of every political organization which would interfere with the progress of justice, or put in jeopardy the great cause of American liberty. On this troublesome question of slavery I fortify my position by the opinions of southern statesmen—of Georgia politicians——

Mr. BAILEY, of Georgia. Name them.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Your patriots of 1776, of the day that tried men's souls—the first colonists of Georgia—those who fought for our liberties. And, recently, your colleague, [Mr. STEPHENS,] who seems to have played the part of the flying Parthian, throwing his arrow at his antagonist, then trusting to the fleetness of his horse for safety. But the gentleman has left his record behind him. On the 25th of January, 1845, he is thus reported:

"As a southern man and Georgian, he protested against the correspondence of the Secretary of State on this subject. The institution of slavery was a domestic one, and the Secretary of State sought to make it a national one. He objected to calling on this Government to strengthen the institution of slavery."

Your institution of slavery is local. We deny the right of the free States, or of the General Government, to abolish or interfere with it, in the States where it is tolerated, and we deny your right to authorize its extension or its support through the power of the Federal Government, either by direct or indirect means. The Constitution confers no power on this subject, except for the reclamation of your fugitive slaves, and I regard any law to carry out that power, which denies the right of jury trial, not only as unjust, but practically inefficient.

[At this point a running discussion took place between Mr. BAILEY, of Georgia, and Mr. CAMPBELL, in reference to trial by jury in the case of fugitive slaves.]

Mr. CAMPBELL. I come now, Mr. Chairman, to the consideration of the only point presented by the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. STEPHENS,] in his first speech, on which we appear to be at issue. That is, the expediency of extending slavery, the comparative merits of free and slave labor, and the relative prosperity of free and slave States. The responsibility of such a comparison does not rest upon me, and I remind the House that the gentleman invited the investigation in his first speech, and followed it up vigorously in his last. I pursue it in no sectional or unkind spirit, but solely with a view to present fairly such facts as should direct us in legislation for the establishment of institutions in our unsettled Territories.

It may be well, sir, to ascertain, before we provide for the increase of slave States or promote the interest of slave labor, the number of American citizens who have a substantial interest in slavery.

The census shows the number of whites in the slave States to be 6,222,418.

Number of slaveholders	347,525
Number owning less than five slaves	174,503
Number owning five and more slaves	173,022

It is a fact worthy of attention, that whilst the whole country is constantly being disturbed by this institution, there are, of the 20,000,000, only 173,000 who own five slaves or more. In the slave States alone, the number of persons who do not own a single slave is 5,874,893; whilst the number of slaveholders is only 347,525. These figures prove either that a large majority of the people of the slave States are opposed to holding slaves on a principle, or agree with me, that even there free labor would be more profitable. The correctness of this conclusion can only be questioned on the ground that the mass are too poor to own even one slave—an assertion which I am not disposed to make.

There are twenty millions of our people, therefore, interested in free labor, and only one third of a million who have property in slaves. Is it wise, is it just, that this interest of the few, which conflicts with the interests of the great mass, as well as the genius of our Government, should be promoted by national legislation? The gentleman assailed the statistical facts which I presented on a former occasion. I shall not now confine my tables to the census returns from Georgia and Ohio. With a purpose to test more fully the merits of free and slave labor, I have carefully compiled tables, drawing the line between the free and slave States. In presenting the results, I refer to the pages of the Compendium of the Census, from which my figures have been taken.

MANUFACTURES, MINING AND MECHANIC ARTS, (page 179.)

Free States	$430,940,051	$465,844,092	950,573	$843,285,058
	$335,210,172	$379,653,453	789,946	$676,862,031

The excess of profit in the free States, it will be seen, is nearly SEVEN HUNDRED MILLIONS OF DOLLARS.

In connection with our manufacturing establishments much is said about northern slavery. True, sir, we have made slaves of our rivers and our mountain cascades. The Connecticut, and the Merrimack, the Miamis, and all the tributaries of the Mississippi, the mountain streamlets, are made to work in supplying the wants of man. Even now Niagara's cataract, with more power than is contained in the bones and sinews of all the Africans on earth, is being enchained and reduced to servitude by northern energy, for the benefit of man.

Closely allied to the mechanical interest is the invention of labor-saving implements, &c. By reference to the list of patents granted, I find issued to the free States.....13,944 issued to the slave States..... 2,396

NUMBER OF PERSONS ATTENDING SCHOOL, AND PER CENT. OF WHITE POPULATION, (Page 144.)

Slave States	970,396	15.46
	Number of Schools.	Ratio for every one thousand whites.
Free States	62,433	4,683

LIBRARIES, OTHER THAN PRIVATE, INCLUDING SCHOOL, COLLEGE, AND CHURCH, (page 159.)

	Number.	Volumes.
Free States	14,893	3,847,617

NEWSPAPERS AND PERIODICALS, (page 156.)

Difference	1,096	253,485,948

RATIO OF ILLITERATE TO NATIVE WHITE POPULATION, (page 152.)

Slave States	8.37 per cent.
Free States	2.40 per cent.

RATIO OF ILLITERATE AMONG FOREIGNERS, (page 152.)

Free States	9.09 per cent.

COMPARATIVE RATIO OF ILLITERATE AMONG NATIVES AND FOREIGNERS, OVER TWENTY YEARS, (page 152.)

	Native.	Foreign.
Slave States	17.23 per cent.	10.62 per cent.
Free States	4.12 per cent.	15.15 per cent.

PER CENT. RATIO OF WHITE ILLITERATE TO TOTAL WHITE POPULATION, (page 152.)

Slave States.	Free States.	Georgia.	Ohio.
8.27	3.36	8.99	3.12

It is worthy of remark that the State from which the gentleman comes, who institutes these inquiries, is ahead of the average of slave States in "illiterate" persons, whilst Ohio, the State he selected for comparison, is below the average of the free States.

CRIME—PRISON STATISTICS.

The gentleman goes into the statistics of crime, and claims a successful comparison. The result of his statistics might be answered by the well known fact that offenses are more promptly and severely punished in the free States than in the South. But there are other facts worthy of presentation, connected with the statistics of crime, in the present state of public feeling, in regard to foreign emigration. The census tables prove remarkable facts. The tables of illiterate show that the foreign emigrants of the South are more intelligent than those of the North, and yet the percentage of crime among the foreigners in slave States is double that in the free States. The ratio of white persons imprisoned out of every ten thousand, in the free States, (page 166,) is:

Foreign-born	5.868
Native-born	1.991

I have the official reports of the board of Governors of the alms-house of the city of New York, for the last year, which furnish important disclosures. I quote the following figures:

	American.	Foreign.
City prison, received 1853	6,303	22,229
Work-house 1853	382	1,986
Penitentiary, Blackwell's Island, received from January 1, 1854, to December 9, 1854	833	2,720
Total	7,518	26,935

The inference the gentleman would seem to draw that crime is more frequent under a system of free labor than of slave labor, is simply preposterous, "blind dogmatic nonsense!" Much of the crime in the North is perpetrated by convicts sent to our shores from foreign countries. In proof of this, I submit the following extract from the New York Times of December 24:

"Yesterday morning a highly important arrest of twelve convicts, sent to the United States at the expense of the Belgian Government, was effected by Sergeant Bell of the Mayor's office, and officers Newman and Freude.

"During the past two years a large number of English felons have arrived here from Botany Bay, whom the authorities of the Old World liberated from confinement, and paid their passage to this port to get rid of them. In the course of the past summer, about fifty of these notorious thieves were captured and returned." * * * "Their crimes ranged from petit-larcenies to robberies on the highway."

The United States consul at Antwerp recently wrote to Collector Redfield, of the city of New York, as follows:

"It has been discussed in the Legislature of Belgium whether it would not be better to send to the United States all criminals at Government expense, rather than to maintain them at home."

I present these facts for the two-fold purpose of meeting the gentleman's criminal statistics, and of calling the attention of our people to the outrages which foreign Governments are perpetrating in turning loose their cut-throats upon our shores.

PAUPERS.

The census tables show the following results:

Free States	50,014	63,689	113,703

More than three fourths of the paupers in the slave States are native-born; in the free States nearly three fifths are foreign-born. The same general facts I have mentioned in reference to foreign criminals sent to northern cities apply to the pauper statistics.

During the year 1853, there were admitted into two institutions of New York city, (Bellevue hospital and the alms-house,) as stated in the report before me:

Foreigners	5,797
Americans	1,236

During the same time the city authorities furnished relief to the "out-door poor:"

Foreigners	30,341
Americans	5,050

In this connection I submit a statement of pauperism in 1850, in several of the free States:

	Foreign.	Native.
Massachusetts	9,247	6,530
New York	40 580	19,975
Pennsylvania	5,635	5,898
Rhode Island	1,445	1,115

GEORGIA AND OHIO.

Mr. Chairman, the gentleman has again pressed upon us his comparison of Georgia and Ohio prosperity, and assails the tables I presented, showing the value of agricultural products of the two States on the basis of New York city prices. He protests against Ohio hay at sixteen dollars per ton, yet I have the Cincinnati prices current, published a few days after he delivered his last speech, showing that it was then selling in that city at seventeen dollars per ton. He is startled, and becomes nervous over the fact, that Ohio hay alone amounts to more than the cotton of Georgia. He complains, too, that I put down his Georgia sweet potatoes at fifty cents per bushel, and claims them to be worth two dollars in New York. His Georgia sweet potatoes are a perishable product, and during the short period they might form an article of commerce, and enter into the exports of Georgia, or into the general consumption of the State, they are not worth more in New York than the rate I affirmed in my former table.

But, sir, I have prepared another table, including every product returned by the census, taking the prices current of New York of the 25th January, which I have preserved to fix the value, which the census does not furnish. To accommodate him I have rated his sweet potatoes at two dollars per bushel, although that figure presents the absurdity of giving Georgia nearly as much credit for her sweet potatoes as for her great staple of cotton. I leave Ohio hay at sixteen dollars, (less than the Cincinnati price, whence it is shipped to southern ports in large quantities.) Whatever sneers the gentleman may have for Ohio hay, and powerful as may be his eloquence in portraying Georgia's success in corn-shucks, it is nevertheless unquestionably true that the quantity of hay produced in Ohio, as returned by the census, estimated at Cincinnati prices, is six millions of dollars ahead of the cotton crop of Georgia estimated at New York city prices! If the census tables are erroneous as to the quantity of products, it is not my fault, for it was the gentleman who commenced this comparison and referred me to these tables. As to his offset of "corn blades," I have only to say, that common sense ought to prove to any mind that Ohio, with fifty millions of bushels of Indian corn, must produce nearly twice the quantity of "shucks," "blades," and "fodder," of Georgia, with her thirty millions of bushels. I have no time to spend on the insignificant question of Georgia corn blades. I presume the gentleman will next set up the superiority of Georgia thunder! I cannot forbear quoting, for the amusement of western farmers, the gentleman's description of the Georgia system of agriculture. He says:

"We grow an immense amount of grass in Georgia; but we do not save it! We put our labor in saving corn blades and shucks!"

This is Georgia progress! She permits the "immense quantities of grass" to go to waste, because she is too busy in gathering shucks! In Ohio, one laborer, with a patent mower, will cut down and save hay which will furnish as much sustenance to stock as one hundred slaves in Georgia could save in gathering shucks. But, sir, I have inquired into this Georgia grass business! A southern planter, on this floor, (whose name I promised not to give,) gave me an account of the manner in which "immense quantities of grass" are produced. He went home from Congress, and one of his head darkies escorted him out to the cornfields. The grass was higher than the corn, and he charged the boy with having neglected the crop. Sambo readily replied, "Not much corn, massa; but mighty nice crop of grass!" Georgia, doubtless, produces the "immense quantities of grass" in like manner.

I submit, as an appendix, the table of agricultural products of the two States. I take the New York prices as the basis, for the reason that it is the head of the market of this country, and quite as accessible for the transportation of the surplus products of Ohio as those of Georgia. The gentleman may quote Smith and McCullough till doom's-day, and still fail of success in proving that the prosperity of any community ought to be measured by the amount of its products if consumed within its own limits. In comparing the success of two States, the only just rule is to take a common market whither the surplus products of the labor of both are exported and sold. The gentleman makes nothing by parading the figures which I hastily gave him some years ago, which merely presented the then supposed rates of Ohio produce upon our farms. My table for both Georgia and Ohio products is predicated upon the current prices in the city of New York, as reported a few days after the gentleman's last speech, and I credit Georgia $14,000,000 for sweet potatoes, not a bushel of which ever enter that market—a product which either rots upon her soil, or is eaten up by her negroes. Still, the agricultural products of Ohio, including live-stock, stand ahead of Georgia nearly one hundred millions of dollars!

LIVE-STOCK.

The gentleman says the comparison of live-stock is "still more favorable to Georgia." I propose to penetrate this point a little deeper than the gentleman has probed it. Live-stock, by the census tables, stands thus:

	Ohio.	Georgia.
Horses and mules	466,810	208,710
Cattle	1,358,947	1,097,528
Swine	1,964,770	2,168,617
	7,733,456	4,035,290

Singular as it may appear, the census justifies the gentleman in boasting that his State has a greater number of hogs than Ohio! What sort of hogs are they, and what do you do with them? Thousands of fatted hogs and bullocks are taken weekly into the New York market from Ohio, but who ever heard of such an animal there from Georgia? If one were introduced there, Barnum would have him in his museum in less than twenty-four hours! I would like to know of the gentleman to what market out of the State Georgia sends her fat beeves and hogs? If she exports, why is it that Ohio pork is often sent to Georgia? I have before me a report of the trade and commerce of Cincinnati for the past year, made to the Chamber of Commerce, by which it is shown that the value of exports from that city alone of pork in barrels, and other products of the hog, amounted to upwards of $9,000,000.

Again, sir, many of the identical horses and mules which make up the gentleman's "favorable table" are the product of Ohio, driven to and sold in Georgia. Will the gentleman claim that horses and mules are raised in Georgia and exported? If he does, I ask where are they sent?

The number of hogs in Ohio has fallen off since the census of 1840. The reason is easily explained. We have a greater number of sheep than Georgia has of horses, mules, cattle, sheep, and swine! The hog produces no wool! Our farmers have reduced their stock of swine and increased their herds of sheep. The annual product of wool is immense. It amounts to $3,500,000—$500,000 more than the entire product of Georgia in wool, and in woolen, cotton, and iron manufactures! I present this fact to demonstrate that the value of live-stock depends upon the product, and not upon the quantity in numbers. This rule will apply more forcibly to neat cattle. In numbers, Georgia appears to have nearly as many cattle as Ohio. The great question is, where are the profits? Take the articles of butter and cheese, products from the dairies. The value of Ohio's products in these two little items is.....$8,971,333
Of Georgia's only..... 932,908

Showing that Georgia, with more than three fourths the number of cattle held in Ohio, produces less than one ninth part of the butter and cheese of that State. The product of Ohio, in butter and cheese alone, is four times as great as the entire product of Georgia in the manufactures of wool, cotton, and iron, which the gentleman has paraded. And, sir, it is greater than the entire product of Georgia in manufactures, mining, and mechanic arts, as exhibited in table page 179.

MANUFACTURES, ETC.

The gentleman complains of my former table under this head, and seemingly charges me with misrepresentation. By reference to the table, (page 179,) he would have observed, under the caption of "products of manufactures, mining, and the mechanic arts," the figures precisely as I gave them, and he would have observed, too, the per cent. profit of the two States in these important branches of industry. I stand by the table so objectionable to him, and reinsert it here, referring him to page 179:

MANUFACTURES, ETC.

	Capital invested.	Raw material.	Annual product.	Per ct. profit.
Ohio	$29,019,538	$24,677,937	$62,647,259	49.97
Ohio ahead	$23,559,055	$21,273,020	$55,560,734	13.91

It shows the net profit under free labor to be thirty-three per cent. greater than under slave labor. I wish him to mark that; and I challenge him to show a single erroneous figure. It embraces all establishments in both States in which there was an annual product of $500. I submit to every fair mind, whether the gentleman has treated the table fairly, and whether he has not attempted to bolster up his sickly cause by charging misrepresentation upon my speech, at the same time he was sending forth, through his own, garbled or detached portions of the returns.

The gentleman has invited me, by his imputations, to an exposition of his conclusions, which, he says, are "never wrong." Now, sir, how has he attempted to prove that Georgia's labor in manufactures is more profitable than that of Ohio? Instead of taking the table on page 179, which includes every branch in both States, he turns over to page 180, and takes the isolated interests of manufactures of wool and cotton. He adopts his "sliding scale" again; sliding in those figures which make for him, and sliding out those which are against him. In cotton and wool, he finds Georgia profits ahead of Ohio; there he stops, and slides out everything else; at the same time, charging error to my figures, which included every branch, whether in favor of or against free labor. By a different combination of figures, under his sliding scale, he might have made his case much stronger. In regard to manufactures, he says:

"I have not looked into the manufacture of iron, to see how the result would stand, because Georgia has very little capital invested in that business, and Ohio has certainly not enough to make it a matter of great importance there."

Now, sir, it is a remarkable fact that he "did not look into the manufacture of iron." By opening the Compendium of the Census, you will observe the cotton and wool tables, which he examined thoroughly, on the one side, and those of iron on the other—(pages 180, 181.)

I will give the footings of the table of iron manufactures:

	Establishments.	Capital invested.	Raw material.	Product.
Ohio	294	$3,731,150	$2,029,885	$4,453,049
Georgia	10	70,900	41,936	115,884
Ohio ahead	214	$3,660,950	$1,980,949	$4,337,165
Deduct entire product of woolen and cotton manufactures of Georgia				2,223,794
Leaves				$2,113,371

The product of iron manufactures in Ohio almost doubles the entire product of all the manufactures of wool, cotton, and iron in Georgia. It is not surprising, therefore, that it was inconvenient for the gentleman "to see how the result would stand!" How he regarded it proper to parade cotton and woolen manufactures as consequential, and then assert in this House, with the tables before his eye as to iron, that "Ohio has certainly not enough to make it a matter of great importance there," passes my comprehension. It may accord with the gentleman's ideas of statesmanship to consider a grave question in such a manner; but, using his own language, "I nail his tables to the counter as base coin!"

WHISKY.

Mr. Chairman, in my former tables I took no account of distilleries. This branch of manufactures is not everywhere regarded as creditable. I introduce the "institution" now because the gentleman has alluded to it, and wish to say that, although we make it extensively, there is not much of it drank in Ohio. We send heavy exports to Georgia. Large quantities, I am told, are sent to the Yankees, down East, who color it with log-wood, put it in bottles, labeled handsomely, call it "London Dock," "Old Otard," &c., &c., and find a ready market for it in Georgia and the South at two dollars per bottle. The gentleman could not procure data upon which to make his calculations. I submit a table, because the exports from distilleries and breweries, in Ohio, form a very heavy item. I have estimated the grain consumed at the market prices in Ohio and in Georgia, and the ale and whisky at the prices in New York, as adopted in the table of agricultural products. The following is the result:

Establishments.	Capital employed.	Raw material.	Product.
Ohio.....58	1,963,974	3,386,542	5,531,600
50	1,973.744	3,363,892	$5,497,420

The excess of Ohio's product, in this branch of manufactures, over Georgia, is more than double the entire product of Georgia in the manufactures of wool, cotton, and iron.

The annual product of Ohio, in butter, cheese, and whisky, is.....14,468,753
Annual product of Georgia, in all branches of manufactures, mining, and mechanic arts, (see page 179,) is..... 7,086,585
Ohio, butter, cheese, and whisky, ahead.....$7,382,998

Mr. Chairman, I have not felt the necessity of introducing this whisky argument, but it struck me as the proper material with which to "wash out" the gentleman's figures. Besides, sir, it is an "institution," a "peculiar institution!" We have the same right so to dignify it that the people of the South have to call slavery an institution! Whisky, like slavery, is peculiar, too. It would be difficult to determine which of these institutions has done most to produce human wo. I have read arguments delivered from the sacred desk to show that slavery is a divine institution! If I had time I might quote as stong proofs from holy writ to show that whisky, too, is a divine institution. It is written, Zachariah ix, 17:

"How great is His goodness, and how great is His beauty. Corn shall make the young men cheerful, and new wine the maids."

My crude opinion on the divinity of these two peculiar institutions is, that they are the inventions of man instigated by the devil!

Having presented a just comparison of the manufacturing interests of Georgia and Ohio, I will exhibit a single county in my State. Ohio contains eighty-seven counties!

The annual product of Hamilton county, Ohio, (page 295,) in manufactures alone, and having only two Representatives on this floor, is	$20,790,743
Whole annual product in manufactures, mining and mechanic arts, in the slave States of Georgia, Alabama, Arkansas, Florida, Mississippi, and Texas, (page 179,) having twenty-five Representatives in this House, and twelve Senators	16,930,810
One county in Ohio ahead of six slave States..	$3,859,933

Having greased out the gentleman's "never wrong" figures with the butter of Ohio, washed out the grease spot with our whisky, and beaten, with a surplus of nearly four millions, the entire product, in manufactures, mining and mechanic arts, of six of his sovereign States with slave labor, by the product of a single county in Ohio with free labor, I bid adieu to his tables on this point.

CHURCHES.

The table, page 138, shows:

Ohio has churches to every 100 square miles	9.86
Georgia has churches to every 100 square miles	3.21

Ohio ahead three to one.

Ohio.....1,457,769, ratio to population	75.100
Georgia.. 639,992, ratio to population, (part slave,)	69.100

Ohio	$1,488 00
	$775 00

Ohio ahead in church comforts more than two to one.

Mr. DeBow's note (same page) says, "the New England and Middle States, and the Territories and California, have nearly the same average value to their churches, which is nearly FOUR TIMES THAT OF OTHER SECTIONS."

One of the happiest days in man's life is that on which he leads to the altar and weds the object of his tenderest affections. Another of his happy days, naturally succeeding this, is that on which he receives into his arms his first-born! I cannot say that the gentleman will appreciate this suggestion; but I present the following table from the census to show, that according to this test, the people of Ohio enjoy a higher degree of happiness than those of Georgia.

MARRIAGES AND BIRTHS IN 1850.

	Married.	Born.
Ohio	22,328	56,884.
Ohio ahead in marriages and babies!	17,351	41,645

The father has days of deep anxiety—none more so than when he watches the developments of his infant to ascertain whether its organs are perfect. Can it see?

PROPORTION OF BLIND WHITE POPULATION—1850.

Ohio	1 to 3,103.
Georgia	1 to 2,328.

Georgia ahead in blindness!

Then again, even though the child be blind, the more deeply interesting inquiry follows: Has it sense? The returns in the census show the following:

PROPORTION OF IDIOT WHITE POPULATION—1850.

Ohio,	1 to 1,455.
Georgia	1 to 1,013.

Georgia decidedly ahead in fools!

Now, Mr. Chairman, I have no disposition to discuss the physical causes which produce these wonderful results. I leave it to others to inquire whether the difference in the character of the labor of the two sections has not an agency in producing these consequences.

Mr. Chairman, it strikes me that this whole question as to the superiority of slave labor, started by the gentleman, is really settled against him by a sensible consideration of the figures quoted by him in his first speech, from the census. I will present the table:

AREA OF THE STATES OF OHIO AND GEORGIA, ETC.

	Total acres.	Acres improved.	Value.	Acres unimproved.
Ohio ...	18,017,493	9,851,493	$358,758,603	*8,146,000
	5,809,686	3,473,014	$263,005,158	*8,296,900

It appears that more than two thirds of the territory of Georgia, an old State, is unimproved—more than half of Ohio, a young State, is improved. Why is this? Georgia, more than a century settled, has only eight Representatives on this floor, with the advantage of a representation based on her property in slaves. Ohio, half a century settled, has, without a slavery representation, twenty-one members!

Ohio farms are valued at	$36 41 per acre.
Georgia farms are valued at	15 01 per acre.

What occasions this vast difference? If Georgia agriculture, under slave labor, is as profitable as Ohio agriculture, under free labor, why does not capital seek investments in Georgia lands and elevate their value? If slavery produces a prosperity in Georgia excelling that of Ohio, why are your lands worth, in the market of the world, less than one half the value of those in Ohio?

The gentleman tells us, and attempts to prove, that the Georgia farmers, manufacturers, and mechanics make a greater profit upon their investments than those of Ohio. If that be true, let him explain why it is that Ohio lands are worth one hundred and fifty per cent. more than those of his State. He may talk about the "wild boy of the forest shooting at the moon," but the country will look upon his tables as mere "moonshine," and as "spurious in their elements and composition," until he explains the cause of the difference in the value of the soil. Capital always runs in that channel which gives it most profit. The soil of Ohio produces, under free labor, to its farmers and artisans who own it, a greater profit, at thirty-six dollars per acre, than that of Georgia does at fifteen dollars. The value of the soil is a just criterion by which to compare the two systems. Free labor stands at thirty-six—slave labor at fifteen!

Mr. Chairman, this issue which the gentleman has now so boldly presented, with a view to keeping open the door for the admission of slavery into free Territories, is by no means a new one. The time was—aye, the good olden time—when the patriots of the South took a correct view of the proposition. I have only time to quote a few passages from the record. As early as 1774, the patriots of Virginia everywhere resolved against slave labor, giving the most forcible reasons for their opposition. In Culpepper county they assembled 7th July, 1774. Henry Pendleton was moderator, (American Archives, 1st vol., 4th series, p. 523) They unanimously

"Resolved, That the importing slaves and convict servants is injurious to this Colony, as it obstructs the population of it with freemen and useful manufacturers; and that we will not buy any such slaves or convict servants hereafter to be imported."

The keen faculties and philanthropic spirit of these patriots enabled them to foresee, and guard against, those fatal causes which would reduce Georgia soil, with slavery upon it, to fifteen dollars per acre, whilst that of the then unbroken wilderness, inhabited only by savages and wild beasts, would be brought up to thirty dollars, if the foot of the slave should not be allowed to make its imprint there.

Again, to bring the matter nearer to the gentleman's home: General Oglethorpe was the first Governor of Georgia. He crossed the briny deep to join the infant Colonies of America in laying deep and strong the foundations of American liberty. I quote his letter from the life of Granville Sharp, page 157:

CRANHAM HALL, October 13, 1776.

* * * * * * *

My friends and I settled the Colony of Georgia, and by charter were established trustees to make laws, &c. We determined not to suffer slavery there, (which is against the Gospel as well as the fundamental law of England,) to be authorized under our authority; we refused, as trustees, to make a law permitting such a horrid crime. The Government, finding the trustees resolved firmly not to concur with what they thought unjust, took away the charter, by which no law could be passed without our consent.

* * * * * * *

The cruel custom of a private man being supported in exercising more power over the man he affirms to have bought as a slave, than the magistrate has over him, the master, is a solecism in politics. This, I think, was taken from the Romans. The horrid cruelty which that proud nation showed in all they did, gave such power to masters of slaves that they confused even the State.

* * * * * * * *

I am exceedingly glad that you have entered the list in opposition to these horrors. It is a proper time to bring these abominable abuses under consideration, and if those who have the power of legislation will be admonished, and correct them, it may save them and us from justly menaced destruction. Your most obedient, &c., &c.,

J. OGLETHORPE.

Would it not now be well for Georgians (who alone have the power over their institution of slavery) to take the advice of the old patriarch who established their Colony, and bring "these abominable abuses under consideration?"

Again, sir, (see American Archives,) the Provincial Congress of Georgia, on the 4th day of July, 1775, resolved unanimously:

"That we will neither import or purchase any slave imported from Africa or elsewhere after this day."

For the same reasons, the Provincial Congress of Georgia, held at Darien on the 12th January, 1775, resolved to manumit their slaves!

I commend to the gentleman from Georgia the study of the early history of his State, as well as the example—which the record shows—her purest patriots have left for him, for me, and the world.

A word or two, sir, in connection with this matter, as to Virginia. A meeting was held in yonder city, on the bank of the Potomac, (Alexandria,) in July, 1774, (see American Archives, p. 600,) The report shows that "George Washington, Esquire," presided. A resolution similar to that which I have quoted from Culpepper was passed unanimously.

But slavery was not driven from the Old Dominion. Now mark the result of the prediction of the men of '74, that it would "obstruct the population of it with freemen and useful manufacturers."

A few days ago a meeting was held in that same city of Alexandria, in full view of this Capitol. One of Virginia's most talented and gifted sons addressed the multitude. His days had been spent within her borders, and he stands high in the estimation of her people. Recently he had traversed the State, as a candidate for their highest honors. He was fresh from her mountain scenes, her plains, her fields, her cities, her harbors, and her great rivers. Henry A. Wise uttered, at Alexandria, in the hearing of many Senators and Representatives, the following beautiful but sad description of Virginia:

"You have the line of the Alleghany, that beautiful blue ridge which stands placed there by the Almighty not to obstruct the way of the people to market, but placed there in the very bounty of Providence to milk the clouds, to make the sweet springs which are sources of your rivers. [Great applause.] And at the head of every stream is the waterfall murmuring the very music of your power. [Applause.] And yet commerce has long ago spread her sails and sailed away from you; you have not, as yet, dug more than coal enough to warm yourselves at your own hearths; you have set no tilt hammer of Vulcan to strike blows worthy of gods in the iron founderies. You have not yet spun more than coarse cotton enough, in the way of manufacture, to clothe your own slaves. You have had, no commerce, no mining, no manufactures. You have relied alone on the single power of agriculture; and such agriculture! [Great laughter.] Your sedge-patches outshine the sun. Your inattention to your only source of wealth has scared the very bosom of mother earth. [Laughter.] Instead of having to feed cattle on a thousand hills, you have to chase the stump tailed steer through the sedge-patches to procure a tough beefsteak. [Laughter.]

I have heard from a Virginian, Mr. Chairman, the rich story of the manner in which the "stump-tailed steer" was pursued, and finally captured by those in quest of a "tough beefsteak." The "big niggers and the little niggers, the big dogs and the little dogs, (from Towser down to Pen,) were all summoned to the chase." The steer fled over hill and vale, and finally took refuge in a sedge-patch. As a dernier resort, they set fire to the sedge-patch and captured him. I am officially informed that after he was butchered, his net weight was precisely forty-eight pounds! And, sir, I am honored with a promise of a "hind-quarter" of the next steer of that sort that is taken.

The distinguished Virginia orator proceeds thus in portraying Virginia progress and prosperity:

"And yet, while your trust has been in the hands of the old negroes of the plantation—while the master knows as little as his slave about the science, the applied science of agriculture, while commerce, and manufactures, and mining have been hardly known, and agriculture has been neglected—notwithstanding all that, and notwithstanding the effect of this has been that you have parted with as much population as you have regained; notwithstanding all this, I say, old Virginia still has a million and a half of population left within her limits. She still has her iron, her coal, her gypsum, her salt, her copper. She still has her harbors and rivers, and her water power, and every source of wealth which thinking men, active men, enterprising men, need apply to." * * * "Her head is in the dust. With all this plenitude of power, she has been dwarfed in the Union; but by her gods! I say that she has the power now, the energy, the resources—may I say the men? to be put upon the line of progress to the eminence of prosperity—to pass New York yet, faster in the Union than ever New York has passed her. [Cheers.] You have been called the "Old Dominion." Let us, as Virginians, I implore you, this night resolve that a new era shall dawn, and that henceforth she shall be called the New Dominion. [Cheering.]"

May God grant it, Mr. Chairman! Let Virginia wake up from her lethargy, shake off the chains which weigh down her energies, and join in that onward march of progress which will bring prosperity to her, glory and renown to our common country, and blessings to the whole human family.

Again, he is reported as having said at another place:

"You all own plenty of land, but it is poverty added to poverty. Poor land added to poor land, and nothing added to nothing gives nothing. [Renewed laughter.] While the owner is talking politics at Richmond, or in Congress, or spending the summer at the White Springs, the lands grow poorer and poorer, and this soon brings land, negroes and all, under the hammer. You have the owners skinning the negroes, and the negroes skinning the land, until all grow poor."

I will not be regarded, I trust, as indorsing the truth of this over-wrought picture of desolation. I do not know that it is just—in fact, I do not believe it is just. I certainly should not have ventured anywhere to have uttered it; but I use it as a reply from a southern statesman, to the claim of the gentleman from Georgia for the superiority of slave labor and the blessings of slavery. It comes from the Democratic candidate for the gubernatorial chair of Virginia, and must be regarded, in the South at least, as high authority. I make these quotations, from southern statesmen of the olden times and of the present, in justification of my own position in reference to slavery, and the effects of slave labor. I trust, hereafter, no southern man, will charge me with being a "Free-Soiler," dealing unjustly by the South.

Mr. Chairman, why was the Missouri compromise repealed? I repeat, that the responsibility must rest on the heads of those who are guilty of the act. No one will share more largely in that responsibility than the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. STEPHENS.] His voice and his influence on this floor passed that bill. He was the master-spirit in the great movement, and his intolerance towards the minority during the contest is known to the country. He need not lay the flattering unction to his soul that in the late elections the question was not considered by the people. The "vox populi" has been sent forth from mountain top and valley; from palace and from log-cabin; and it will, ere long, be reverberated in this Hall, in tones not to be misunderstood either by the gentleman or the party in power, with whom he acts, in the language of the maxim: "Cease regnare si non vis judicare." "Cease to rule if you will not do justice."

Mr. Chairman, the gentleman seems to be amazed at my temerity, in entering the lists of debate with him. I have no apologies to make. He seems, too, to compare me to the "wild boy of the forest!" When I was, in truth, a "wild boy of the forest," I remember to have read a story of one who exhibited a disposition somewhat similar to that which the gentleman has displayed on this floor, in pressing the extension of slavery. I think he will find it regularly reported in the Book of Samuel! The Philistines were led on against the armies of Israel by one who seemed amazed that any warrior should have the temerity to meet him:

"The staff of his spear was like a weaver's beam, and his spear's head weighed six hundred shekels of iron: and one bearing a shield went before him.

"And he had a helmet of brass upon his head, and he was armed with a coat of mail, and the weight of the coat was five thousand shekels of brass."

In short, Mr. Chairman, the old Philistine had brass all over him.

"And he stood and cried to the armies of Israel:" * * "Choose you a man for you, and let him come down to me.

"When Saul, and all Israel, heard these words of the Philistine, they were dismayed, and greatly afraid."

But, Mr. Chairman, the record goes on to state, that there came up a "wild boy from the forest," who had taken the lion by the beard, and smote and slew him, and delivered the lamb from his mouth. He came with simple sling and stone, and went to battle upon his confidence in the justice of his cause. The brass of the Philistine did not save him, because there was a soft place in his head!

"And David put his hand into his bag, and drew thence a stone, and slang it, and smote the Philistine in the forehead; and the stone sunk into his forehead, and he fell upon his face, to the earth!"

Thus, Mr. Chairman, fell Goliah of Gath!

I see the statement made in the papers, Mr. Chairman, that the manner of the gentleman from Georgia, in his discussion on this subject, bore a strong resemblance to that remarkable man, John Randolph, of Roanoke. This may be true. I am willing the compliment should be conferred upon him; but, sir, I have to say, that were the real "old Roanoke" to rise up from his grave, and with his cutting sarcasm, shrill voice, and bony finger, attempt to deter me from my humble defense of freedom, I would simply quote the fact, that when he was preparing his accounts for eternity, one of his last acts on earth was to give freedom to his slaves, and furnish them homes in Ohio!

Mr. Chairman, this controversy is closed, at least for the present. I leave it as I entered it—with no personal feeling of unkindness towards the gentleman from Georgia, or any other member on this floor. I am firmly, resolutely determined in the future, as I have been in the past, to oppose the extension of slavery; but I seek no conspicuous position in any struggle. A few more short days, and we separate—many of us to meet no more on this side of Jordan. Before another Congress convenes, my mortal remains may sleep under the shade of my native buckeye, and I desire we should part in peace. If life is spared me, however, I shall return to these scenes of strife, in obedience to the decree of the people. I shall come to respect the feelings and opinions of others, yet determined to defend my own principles, and the rights of my constituents, under all circumstances, and at all hazards! And, sir, I believe there will be many others from the wild-wood of the free forests, each of whom will come here with his "five smooth stones gathered from the brook," ready to defend the right. Should I stand alone, believing that my position on this subject is founded upon the immutable principles of God's justice, I shall not be dismayed when the wild storm may rage in these Halls. Planting myself firmly upon the principles of liberty and truth, as proclaimed by the founders of the Republic, if the Philistines gather around in battle array, I will draw my feeble blade, and bid defiance in the language of the gallant Fitz James, when surrounded by the clan of Roderick:

"Come one, come all—this rock shall fly
From its firm base, as soon as I!"

GEORGIA AND OHIO—SLAVERY.

SPEECH OF HON. D. J. BAILEY,

OF GEORGIA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

February 28, 1855.

The House being in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union—

Mr. BAILEY, of Georgia, said:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: It will not be denied to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. CAMPBELL] that he is distinguished for liberality in extending to others, while he is speaking, the privilege of being heard in explanation. I regret the direction given to this discussion between the distinguished gentlemen from Georgia and Ohio [Mr. CAMPBELL and Mr. STEPHENS] requires, from a sense of respect due from me as a Representative from Georgia, to do what it is well known I seldom do, to intrude upon the time and attention of the House. But, as the gentleman has made reference to the public sentiments of the South, and more especially to Georgia, and claims to be justified in doing so, first by dubbing the gentleman [Mr. STEPHENS] the leader of the South, and then to hold that section of the Union responsible for his vagaries in politics, it is my duty to reply to him. Will the gentleman allow me a few moments of his time for the purpose of reply upon that subject?

Mr. CAMPBELL. I do not wish to yield the time. If the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BAILEY] repudiates the position of his colleague, he can say so in a word, and put himself right upon the record.

Mr. BAILEY. I wish to say this: I not only repudiate the position imputed by the gentleman [Mr. CAMPBELL] to my distinguished colleague, in reference to the powers of this Government in enacting laws for the disposition and regulation of the Territories, discriminating against the slaveholder of the South, but upon other questions of public policy. It is not my design, Mr. Chairman, by this interruption, to throw the gentleman from Ohio from his train of argument, and, if I am permitted, will endeavor to secure the floor to reinstate his time, as I deem it, at this point and on this occasion, appropriate to speak what I desire to say.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Very well; I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. BAILEY. I do not wish to take advantage of the gentleman's courtesy, and will, as I have stated, if the floor is obtained by me, allow him time to conclude.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I trust to the courtesy of the committee to allow me to extend my remarks.

Mr. BAILEY. It was not my expectation or wish, Mr. Chairman, to mingle any opinion of mine in this blackberry and crabgrass discussion between the gentleman from Ohio and the gentleman from Georgia; and if it had been confined to the extent of their respective knowledge of the statistics of the country, I would have been content to remain silent.

Mr. CAMPBELL, (interrupting.) The gentleman will allow me to say that I have put the question on higher ground, namely, freedom and slavery. That is the point.

Mr. BAILEY. That is true; but the discussion between the gentlemen is properly characterized, as reference was made to the productive capacity of their respective States, and, if my memory is correct, crabgrass was not the least prominent element in the discussion between them; and I frankly admit that, so far as it relates to that part of their controversy, seeing no practical good to result to the country, I entertain no sympathy for either; and however highly they appreciate their respective States, however much they may boast of the localities in which they live, yet I have no reason to believe that the people will either sympathize with them, or derive great profit from their efforts upon the subject.

The gentleman from Ohio states truly that no one of the Representatives from Georgia had, upon this floor, taken issue with my colleague, or to deny in this House, that what is usually termed the Wilmot proviso is not the orthodox political faith of themselves or their constituents. I did not suppose at the time the two gentlemen were making themselves the champions of the States of Georgia and Ohio, that if any one remained silent that it was to be construed as an implied assent to what either should say.

Now, sir, making comparisons between particular States, in presenting here the superior advantages and higher social cultivation of one over another, is not so well calculated to improve that comity, and fellowship, and justice to each which alone can secure the harmony of all; but, sir, on the contrary, it only serves to estrange one section of the Union from the other. Suppose the gentlemen transpose their comparisons from Ohio and Georgia, each known as empires—one in the West, the other in the South—and lead out Delaware and Rhode Island for exhibition with the majestic dimensions of Georgia and Ohio. Now, Mr. Chairman, my political creed teaches that, though small in territorial area, Delaware and Rhode Island are entitled to and have all the attributes of political sovereigns that vain glory attaches to either Georgia, Ohio, or any other State.

The people of Georgia know they live in a State containing more than sixty thousand square miles, with a population rapidly running beyond a million, with a productive capacity to bountifully supply all the wants of man; but, sir, I know them too well to suppose they would tolerate an invidious, taunting comparison with either of those smaller States; and, Mr. Chairman, although not acquainted with the constituents of the gentleman from Ohio, yet I do not doubt they too will not sympathize with him, although he has borne his part in the contest with an ability not to be disputed.

Mr. CAMPBELL. But that is not the point. I want the gentleman to say whether he thinks Congress has the power to exclude slavery from the Territories? That is the point. Do you repudiate the position of your colleague?

Mr. BAILEY. I have already stated that, if such are the opinions of my colleague, I not only repudiate them for myself, but will, in the name of the people of Georgia, deny, here and elsewhere, that such heresy is the public sentiment of that State upon that vital question to their peace; and will continue to do so until they, for that cause, repudiate me, and deny me the right to speak for them.

Mr. Chairman, my colleague is absent on this occasion, otherwise I would endeavor, having been involved involuntarily in this discussion, to criticise his position upon this subject in a manner different from that which I choose to do now; for, while I deny the jurisdiction of this Government over the question of slavery anywhere, either in the States or Territories, organized or unorganized, it follows that it cannot be made a legitimate question for discussion here.

If the gentleman from Ohio seeks to convict my colleague of the abominable doctrine that, by the act of this Government, his constituents in Ohio can occupy the public domain with all their property of every kind and quality, to the exclusion of my constituents, or those of my colleague, it is, I suppose, a deduction from the refusal of Georgia's distinguished Representative from the eighth district to answer yea or nay to the question propounded to him upon that subject. I am not the conscience keeper of my colleague; but will tell the gentleman, if an Abolitionist, under like circumstances, should think proper to propound to me questions upon this floor touching this vital question to the peace of the South, I would not give such answer as to leave anything to construction, or in doubt, but would denounce the doctrine, and the Abolitionist, too.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I do not know that I comprehend fully the feelings of the gentleman from Georgia in applying to me the term "Abolitionist;" sometimes it is meant as an offensive epithet. If it is not meant here in an offensive sense I do not care, I am willing to let the gentleman go on. If it is, I cannot extend my right further to him.

Mr. BAILEY. I do not so intend it for the purpose of insulting, but spoke only as I thought was the fact, since I understand him to profess sentiments of disrespect to sacred ties which bind the States in this Union, and to do all he can to inflict the odious principles of the Wilmot proviso, as it is called, upon the Territories. And, Mr. Chairman, I expressed my indebtedness to the courtesy of the gentleman for allowing me to occupy the floor, which he had the right to control; and after this had been done by him, I would scorn myself if the occasion was used to offer insult; and I think I can say more, that intentional insult was never sought to be offered by me to any person; and I will maintain sufficient self-respect to abstain, at all times, from making the House of Representatives the arena to display resentments for grievances. So far as the opprobrium of the word Abolitionistis concerned, if I am not mistaken, I take the acknowledgment from his own lips the last night in the discussion of the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia and the Territories of the Union.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I did not say anything upon the subject last night; but I will prove, if this committee will give me the time to do so, that every position I have taken upon the subject of slavery is indorsed by the gentleman's colleague. I have the record here to do it.

Mr. BAILEY. I have already intimated that my purpose was not to discuss the record of my colleague before this committee; but if I do discuss that record at any time, it shall be before the tribunal of a people who have the right not only to pronounce but to inforce their judgment upon any issue that may be made between us. But if I am mistaken as to the remarks made by the gentleman from Ohio touching the Territories, of course I am disposed to be corrected.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I made the remark in the course of the debate last night, that there was not a man returned from my State to the next Congress in favor of the repeal of the Missouri compromise.

Mr. BAILEY. And I would ask what is the proper interpretation of the admission that "not a solitary member willing to allow the South to be at peace is returned to the next Congress from the State of Ohio," with her twenty-two Representatives standing in the front column of the great States of political power in giving tone and direction to the administrative policy of this Government? It was known to the country before the admission made by the gentleman, that the Democratic party had been defeated by Free-Soilers, most determined in their opposition to the property holders of the southern States, and such Free-Soilers whose political views leaves scarcely a line of dictinction between themselves and unmitigated Abolitionists. If a distinction exists, it is that difference which is between a great devil and a little one. The result of the late elections in the State of Ohio, and in all the States known as free States, where but few have survived the political shock of the number who professed a willingness to permit the South to direct its own domestic policy upon terms of equality with other States in the Union, has demonstrated the power of that element which threatens so much danger to the South. If the hypothesis of the gentleman be true, that the elections in the States alluded to have turned upon the question of opposition to the Kansas and Nebraska bill, or, more properly, the question of right claimed by the Free States, to prescribe, by congressional legislation, terms upon which the people of the South may emigrate to, and make their homes in, the common Territories of the Union, furnishes additional argument of the hostility of the North to the institution of slavery.

It has been contended upon this floor and elsewhere, by distinguished gentlemen, that the Kansas and Nebraska question had but little, if any, influence in the late elections; yet I am constrained to believe otherwise; and from the evidence which has been adduced, with my convictions, it would be the worst duplicity to attempt, by concealment, to lull the fears of the South.

I have heretofore refused to discuss the subject of slavery, because this Government has no jurisdiction over the question, only so far as it is the duty of the Federal Government to extend its protection over it as other property: I deny that the Federal Government has either the power to create or to destroy property belonging to the citizens of the United States—that being a right reserved to the people of the several States. The invasion of this right reserved in the States would be a violation of the compact of federation, and it would furnish more solemn obligations on the part of the people of any State to consult their safety and resist the wrong than is found in the rhetorical flourish of a Chatham.

If it is admitted, or I should say, more properly, if this Government, by any provision of the Constitution, can, by legislation, embarrass the title of the owner of a negro, or destroy the property recognized and secured by the States, the whole ground is yielded, and the South would stand disarmed of all rightful cause to act by interposing the sovereign will of the State, to defend the people in the full and unrestricted enjoyment of property, subject only to such rational exactions as may be necessary and proper for the preservation of Government. And if the concession is made that the South has no guaranty in the terms of the Constitution, the question of expediency thereby becomes the only limit for the discretion assigned in the legislative action of this Government. Mr. Chairman, I am yet to learn that any statesman of the South, whose boldness has led him to avow such doctrine, has, when understood, obtained the indorsement of even a sufficient number to constitute a faction; but at a time when the public mind is withdrawn from vigilant scrutiny of the sentiments of the Representatives upon this subject, it should not be inferred that the people yield their approval, and are compromitted in their right to think, speak, and act, at all times when the exigency arises.

Mr. Chairman, I am no alarmist; but if unwilling to persuade the people that security is found in a state of repose, with an abiding confidence in those they constitute rulers of the public interests, it would be equally false to duty not to point to dangers which are near at hand, and which must come, be realized, felt, known, and seen, when that party is installed into power, which has demolished, wherever the test has been made, the Democracy which stood so recently in serried ranks from one extremity of the Union to the other, directing the administration of this Government for the common benefit of all and hurtful to none.

In reviewing the history of the country we find that however violent and ungovernable the spirit of partisan strife has exhibited itself, yet when the people, ever prompted to justice, have determined to rescue the Government from the control of political managers they have never failed to restore harmony to all sections. But we cannot avoid the startling fruth, that however potent the people have been in controlling those who had no higher ambition than to aspire to leadership upon all questions hitherto constituting the basis of party action, except the subject of slavery, which has become isolated and distinct from all other questions upon which parties have separated, and I would ask the people of the South to inquire for themselves, why is it that those great questions of public policy upon which political parties, from the day the Government was put into operation, have ceased longer to excite the mind of the North? It is, sir, the policy of the Whigs of the free States to make the question of slavery paramount to all other questions. This, I suppose, no one will have the temerity to deny, unless he is grossly ignorant of the issues involved in the elections to which allusion has been made, or determined to conceal the melancholy truth from a confiding constituency. For here in this Hall the declaration has been made and repeated, that one hundred and seventeen members are already elected to the next House of Representatives, who stand pledged to continue the slavery agitation, and urge the restoration of the Missouri compromise. This fully establishes to my mind that but little, if any, reliance can be reposed in any party of the North upon this, which is above all party questions of the South. I can, Mr. Chairman, look around me, in this Hall, and see many noble specimens of true American patriotism, who boldly dared to perform their constitutional duty, by which the equality of the South was restored, and which had been, for more than an age, denied by the Federal Government.

And while I am grateful that virtue was to be found in those northern patriots who directed the legislation of Congress, by restoring equality to that section of the Union in which my fortune is cast, yet the pleasure is almost lost in the recollection of the fact that those by whose agency it was consummated have been, with but few exceptions, cut down and prostrated by the tide of the anti-slavery feeling which swept over the free States. And it is strange to say that those who have thus fallen belonged to one party, and that party whose policy has ever been to do justice to each and every section of the Union. Will any one doubt the party to which I allude? None will doubt that it is the Democratic party.

This is not all, sir. My regret is greatly increased, Mr. Chairman, when it is seen that the Whig party of the South, with a full knowledge of the facts before them, fails to do that justice to them that magnanimous impulses can alone prompt.

But I will not despair of the final achievement of victory by the Democrats of the free States over the unnatural alliance of the Whigs of the North with that party of the South. This is not the first of their political reverses while battling for the Constitution, as it is, against the combination of every cast of opposition; and I would cheer them on with every demonstration of confidence, until they attain the higher honor of vindicating the American character against the imputation of incapacity for self-government and indifference to the solemn terms of a written Constitution; for, Mr. Chairman, if the Democratic party cannot attain these ends, no party ever will.

In connection with this subject, I desire to submit a few remarks upon a question which has passed from public attention, as it is germane to the present discussion; and I do so only to direct the attention of southern gentlemen to the fact that, however anxious they may be to divert their fellow citizens from the relations existing between them and other sections of the Union, yet no appliances of politicians can conceal the truth only for a time.

Has it occurred to you, Mr. Chairman, that, within the short period of less than two years, the confidence which was so eagerly expressed in primary meetings of the people, in the legislative resolves of the States, and more particularly in this branch of Congress, that the slavery agitation had ceased forever, both in and out of Congress; that the sun would rise and set in all time to come upon our country, upon a people united, free, happy, contented, and prosperous? But if doubts were entertained and expressed it was the signal of political death to the unfortunate unbeliever.

This question, above all others, I desire to see this Government not to touch with hostile intentions, as the State of Georgia, in convention of the people, has declared the ultimatum upon which she will interpose the highest power of her sovereignty; and I ask you not to abuse her patience, or require her to test before the world the sincerity of her professions. And in the position of that State, in which, at present, all earthly ties and interest exist, and where, in future, I desire to remain and share a common fate, whether for good or evil, with my fellow-citizens, other southern States stand side by side with her, and fearful will be the result, should the madness of those who deal in threats attempt to put them to the trial.

History will exhibit a jarring record of the age in which we live when it presents one Congress expressing the tone of public opinion upon a subject reversed by the ensuing Congress, as we find at the last Congress, shortly after I was honored with a place here as Representative, the predominant sentiment prevailed that the agitation of slavery was at an end. I allude to what is called the "finality" resolutions, which were thrown into this House, and arbitrarily demanded support as a test of fidelity; doubtless more for Representatives of the South than the accomplishment of any other object. I allude to the resolutions which were adopted by a large majority of that body on the 5th day of April, 1852. The resolutions read as follows:

"That we recognize the binding efficacy of the compromises of the Constitution, and believe it to be the intention of the people generally, as we hereby declare it to be ours individually, to abide such compromises, and to sustain the laws necessary to carry them out—the provision for the delivery of fugitive slaves, and the act of the last Congress for that purpose included—and that we deprecate all further agitation of questions growing out of that provision of the questions embraced in the acts of the last Congress, known as the compromise, and of questions generally connected with the institution of slavery, as unnecessary, useless, and dangerous."

It was my fortune to vote against this resolve, adopted by the better judgment and wise council of Congress. I believed then, and further reflection and continued observation, have confirmed the belief and settled opinion, instead of removing the impressions entertained, that "it was the intention of the people generally to abide the compromises of the Constitution, and sustain the laws and provisions for the delivery of fugitive slaves," was not sustained by the evidence before the country.

On the occasion to which allusion has been made, it was too apparent that many hearts beat with high expectations that a triumph had been obtained over a small number of Representatives then upon this floor. But that triumph was dearly bought, as those Representatives who cast their vote with the majority, have not only been deceived themselves, but have thereby deceived their constituents.

It would have been a pleasant task for me to perform, if I could have concurred in the belief that the questions embraced in the resolutions which are referred to, were a final disposition of the slavery question.

It requires no argument to prove that a resolve of Congress as to the finality of any question, can have any binding force upon the people. The slavery question, like all others, is alone subject to the control of the people, from whose judgment there is no appeal. Those who did not sustain the resolutions from the southern States, were denounced not only as agitators, but unfriendly to the continuance of the union of the States; I trust that those whose judgment upon this question did not concur with the majority may prove to be mistaken; still, Mr. Chairman, my opinions remain unaltered, and I yet entertain doubts and fears.

I am sensible that my opinions have but little influence here, either one way or the other; yet the people whose Representative I am feel some degree of interest in my course, especially upon the slavery question, which is above all other questions with them; and from the time it was manifested this Government was disposed to disregard and restrict their rights in the disposition of the territories acquired from Mexico, a deeper feeling of distrust has fixed upon them; and, knowing their solicitude upon this subject, when, sir, I fail or refuse to represent their views, I shall cease to be their Representative any longer, and ask them to select another.

In the contest of 1850 and 1851, which gentlemen remember as well as myself, the position I occupied failed to be adopted by the people of Georgia. Through that contest, which was a fiery ordeal to pass, I was enabled to survive, which can never be forgotten on account of the blows received by those who contended for the rights of the South and the sovereignty of the States.

Justice requires me to say, with all proper respect for the opinions of others, had the policy prevailed of those with whom I acted an humble part, I entertain no doubt whatever of the final settlement of the question, the mere mention of which forms a dividing line between the two great sections of the country, and the agitation of which threatens and perils the existence of the Union.

The councils of our friends, however, were unheeded, and we were forced reluctantly to acquiesce in the opinion and decision of those from whom we differed; and I will say, in regard to the platform which they laid down in language so clear and unmistakable, that the causes they delineated with so much precision upon which they pledged themselves "to disrupt the ties that bind the State to the Union," may never arise.

It is not necessary for me here to speak my opinions of the strength of the Union, or how far it overrides all other political considerations. I am unwilling, however, to hackney the word in every discussion involving the rights of the South to strike vain terror into those who shall attempt to inflict a wrong by refusing the observance of constitutional obligations. I would not be proud of the title of American citizen if I could be induced to put in the balance, to estimate the value of the Union, the greatest blessing, short of Heaven, except the liberties of the people.

Permit me, now, Mr. Chairman, to make a brief allusion to the remarkable attitude in which the distinguished gentleman from Virginia [Mr. LETCHER] presented himself before this House and the country in the course of debate on yesterday upon this subject; his patriotism was shown in the indignant rebuke against the threatened aggression upon the political rights of the South, and the fire of whose eloquence is worthy to be associated with the ancient character of the Old Dominion; if the crisis should come—which may a merciful Providence ever avert—when her citadel of State sovereignty shall be invaded by hostile force, if living, his strong arm will doubtless be raised in its defense, as surely, when he is numbered with things that were, his clarion notes sounded in this Hall will serve to awaken his countrymen to rally to the post of duty.

But, I would ask, is it not a little strange that this valiant defender of southern rights should avail himself of the distinguished position which no one will dispute he occupies here as the leader of the Democratic party, to assail—in fact, to stigmatise—the Administration, a short time ago, for the appointment of a gentleman to represent this Government abroad, who has accorded to him not only talents of the highest order, but a devotion to the South which will bear a comparison with the gentleman himself?

I am unwilling, sir, to withhold from Mr. Soulé the benefit of the fullest expression of confidence in his merit as a representative of his country in a foreign land, or to sanction the opinion that he has not carried with him to the post assigned him, the unqualified confidence and approval of the overwhelming masses of the southern people; and if to-day the voice of that section of the Union could be heard, it would come with welcome greeting to the ear of the President of the United States, that he had so far discharged his official duty as to secure the sanction of his countrymen.

I do not mean to say that no discordant note was heard, of grumblers, that the distinguished honor should have been conferred upon one equally deserving with others as Mr. Soulé; for it is well known, when the intelligence was given to the country that Mr. Soulé was accredited as the representative of the American people at the Court of Madrid, a systematic plan of opposition was manifested in that section of the Union which at all times watches the progress of the Government to throw impediments in the way of success to that section of the country whose interests had been represented in the United States Senate by him with such eminent ability.

It will scarcely be denied that this feeling of opposition had grown to such length that the flag which bore this minister to his destination carried also the plot of moral treason from our shores, to incite hostility to his success, and render his efforts in behalf of his country abortive. Malignity, in its most violent spirit, has not the temerity to charge that one whose life has been devoted to the cause of republicanism would falter in the performance of any duty. And though, sir, the chief object which his country expected him to accomplish as Minister to Spain having failed, yet the confidence of his fellow-citizens has not abated.

I will say to the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. Letcher,] if the dangers which he has so eloquently depicted as impending over the country actually exist, when the hour of trial shall come he will find this much-abused statesman in the front rank, defending his country's cause, and from him may be learned a lesson of true patriotism and an example worthy of his imitation.

The extreme opinions imputed to Mr. Soulé upon those territorial questions which were supposed to be settled by the friends of that system of measures, now regarded by the gentleman from Virginia as being a delusion upon the South, furnishes a flimsy pretext for the assault upon that minister.

But the grave charge is made that Mr. Soulé has not only subjected himself to the fault of contending for all the rights of the South, but another and greater disqualification, urged against him and the policy of the Administration in his appointment, is found in the fact that he was born in the country where Lafayette claimed his birthright, and in which lies entombed that manly form of nature's nobleman who, with sword unsheathed, side by side with the Father of his Country, exposed himself to every danger, submitted to every sacrifice, and, without flinching, shed his blood to triumph in battle and achieve the independence of our country.

Mr. Chairman, however willing others may be to disregard the plain provisions of the Constitution securing political rights to the adopted citizens, I will not, here or elsewhere, perpetrate such a libel upon that instrument either to obtain favor from a powerful party or avoid its proscription.

EXECUTION OF UNITED STATES LAWS.

SPEECH OF HON. S. A. DOUGLAS,

OF ILLINOIS,

Friday, February 23, 1855.

The Senate having under consideration the bill to provide for the protection of Officers and other persons executing the Laws of the United States, debate ensued, of which the following is part. The other part has been heretofore published. [See pp. 211-246.]

Mr. DOUGLAS said: Mr. President, I am at a loss to understand the precise object of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. Wade] in the extraordinary course of remark in which he has indulged. Failing to maintain the positions he assumed in opposition to the bill, he has poured forth a torrent of denunciation and calumny in the place of facts and argument. After denouncing the bill as monstrous and nefarious—one which no honest man can support—he says he does not blame southern men for advocating it, and insisting upon its passage. He has even gone to the extent of declaring that, wicked and nefarious as it is in all its provisions and principles, yet, were he a southern man, and the representative from a slaveholding State, he would vote for it. That is to say, it is an iniquitous measure, and if he were a southern man he would perpetrate the inquity; it is a base act, but if he were a southern man, and it would promote his interest, he would perform the deed! According to his doctrine, the act is infamous if performed by a northern man; right and honest, if done by a southern man! Sir, I was not educated in that school of morality which teaches that the same act is morally right or wrong, is virtuous or iniquitous, according to the parallels of latitude where the man resides who may perform it. If an affirmative vote on the bill be morally right in a Senator from the South, I am unable to perceive how it can be wrong in a northern Senator. Do we not all owe allegiance to the same Constitution? Are we not all bound alike to support it by the same oath? Do we not all acknowledge accountability to the same eternal God? How, then, can a vote, given in obedience to that oath, to carry into effect the provisions of that Constitution, in the presence of the same Divine Being, be just and honest when given by a Senator from one portion of the Republic, and at the same time be nefarious and infamous when given by a Senator from another portion of the same country?

Sir, if this bill is right South, it is right North; if it is honest South, it is honest North; if its support be right in a southern man, it cannot be wrong in a northern man. Sir, I despise this miserable attempt to excite prejudice against a just and necessary measure, for no better reason than that it was reported from the appropriate committee by a Senator from Connecticut instead of a Senator from South Carolina. God forbid that I should judge the merits of a legislative enactment by the residence of the man who happened to be the organ of the committee for introducing it. It is not the first time I have seen on this floor those who obtained their seats in the Senate by appeals to passion and prejudice at home, by stirring up sectional strifes, and inflaming the North against the South, become the fawning sycophants and fulsome flatterers of those very southern men whom they have traduced and maligned; whose character, constituents, institutions, and civilization they are in the daily habit of denouncing as criminal and infamous in the eyes of God and man. Wrong for a northern man to introduce a bill providing for the execution of the laws of the land, which it is right for a southern man to support, and for which these immaculate anti-slavery men say they would vote were they southern men.

That is the argument. It is the argument of all who seek to dissolve this Union. Array the North against the South—stimulate the passions of each—urge them into deadly conflict—tell the South you do not blame them; that you would do as they do, were you southern men; that you only blame those northern doughfaces or traitors who seek to preserve peace and fraternity by a strict obedience to the Constitution and a faithful execution of the laws made in pursuance of it. Yes, we are called traitors because of our fidelity to the Constitution. Doughfaces and cowards because of our obedience to that Constitution as our fathers made it, and we, upon the holy Evangelist, swore to preserve inviolate. Doughfaces because we stand between the Constitution and those who seek to trample upon its provisions; because we stand between the Union and those whose measures are aimed at its destruction. They tell us that we are in vain attempting to resist an overwhelming torrent of northern sentiment; that our course is rushing us to inevitable self-destruction; that we are destined to be swept from the face of the earth, and sunk to the lowest depths of obloquy and infamy, from which there is no resurrection. With this awful doom impending over us, doughfaces and cowards as we are, we calmly look the storm in the face, defy its mutterings and howlings about our heads, and hold on firmly to the Union and to the Constitution as the surest and only means of preserving it, while the sentence is being pronounced which is to decide our fate. This is cowardice, when courage consists in pandering to the passions and prejudices of those immediately around you, while you hurl defiance and insult and calumny at those who are a thousand miles distant. We would cease to be doughfaces, and become as brave as you, if we would only have the courage to throw overboard the Constitution as the compass by which to guide the ship of State, and run with wind and tide, setting a sail for every breeze, and changing our course with the shiftings of the wind. You can pay us no higher compliment than is contained in the charge that we stand firmly by our principles, regardless of consequences personal to ourselves, and hazarding popularity and position in preference to yielding to those mercenary and ambitious allurements which seduce bad men from their fidelity to the Constitution.

Mr. President, the Senator from Ohio [Mr. Wade] has invaded the circle of my private relations in search of materials for the impeachment of my official action. He has alluded to certain southern interests which he insinuates that I possess, and remarked, that where the treasure is there the heart is also. So long as the statement, that I was one of the largest slaveholders in America was confined to the Abolition newspapers and stump orators, I treated it with silent contempt. I would gladly do so on this occasion, were it not for the fact that the reference is made in my presence by a Senator for the purpose of imputing to me a mercenary motive for my official conduct. Under these circumstances, silence on my part in regard to the fact, might be construed into a confession of guilt in reference to the impeachment of motive. I therefore say to the Senator, that his insinuation is false, and he knows it to be false, if he has ever searched the records or has any reliable information upon the subject. I am not the owner of a slave and never have been, nor have I ever received, and appropriated to my own use, one dollar earned by slave labor. It is true that I once had tendered to me, under circumstances grateful to my feelings, a plantation with a large number of slaves upon it, which I declined to accept, not because I had any sympathy with Abolitionists or the Abolition movement; but for the reason that, being a northern man by birth, by education, and residence, and intending always to remain such, it was impossible for me to know, understand, and provide for the wants, comforts, and happiness of those people. I refused to accept them because I was unwilling to assume responsibilities which I was incapable of fulfilling. This fact is referred to in the will of my father-in-law, as a reason for leaving the plantation and slaves to his only daughter, (who became the mother of my infant children,) as her separate and exclusive estate, with the request that if she departed this life without surviving children, the slaves should be emancipated and sent to Liberia at the expense of her estate; but in the event she should leave surviving children, the slaves should descend to them, under the belief, expressed in the will, that they would be happier and better off with the descendants of the family with whom they had been born and raised, than in a distant land where they might find no friend to care for them. This brief statement, relating to private and domestic affairs, (which ought to be permitted to remain private and sacred,) has been extorted and wrung from me with extreme reluctance, even in vindication of the purity of my motives in the performance of a high public trust. As the truth compelled me to negative the insinuation so offensively made by the Senator from Ohio, God forbid that I should be understood by any one as being willing to cast from me any responsibility that now does, or ever has attached to any member of my family. So long as life shall last—and I shall cherish with religious veneration the memory and virtues of the sainted mother of my children—so long as my heart shall be filled with parental solicitude for the happiness of those motherless infants, I implore my enemies, who so ruthlessly invade the domestic sanctuary, to do me the favor to believe, that I have no wish, no aspiration, to be considered purer or better than she, who was, or they, who are, slaveholders. Sir, whenever my assailants shall refuse to accept a like amount of this species of property tendered to them under similar circumstances, and shall perform a domestic trust with equal fidelity and disinterestedness, it will be time enough for them to impute mercenary motives to me in the performance of my official duties.

Now, sir, a few words in regard to the bill which has furnished the occasion for this furious onslaught upon my friend from Connecticut [Mr. Toucey] and myself. What objection has been urged to it, except that it was introduced by a northern instead of a southern man? The same objection was urged to the Nebraska bill, when I reported it from the Committee on Territories, in accordance with the principles recognized in the compromise of 1850, which that Senator, and the party with which he then professed to act, were solemnly pledged to adhere to "in substance and principle." You, sir, [turning to Mr. Wade,] not only supported General Scott upon the Whig platform in 1852, but affirmed the same principles in your vote for the Washington territorial bill in 1853, which, like the Nebraska bill, repealed a prohibition of slavery, in order that the people might have the opportunity of deciding the slavery question for themselves in conformity with the principles recognized in the compromise of 1850.

The bill for the organization of Washington Territory received the vote of every northern Senator who now denounces me for doing, in Nebraska, precisely what each of them did in Washington Territory only eleven months before! If you are sincere in your complaints of my conduct in reference to Nebraska, what explanation, what excuse are you prepared to give your constituents for your betrayal of what you are pleased to call northern rights in Washington Territory? If I betrayed the cause of freedom in 1854, you set me the example in 1853. The bill passed this body unanimously about three months after the presidential election, when both parties were pledged by their platforms to sustain the principle of allowing the people of each State and Territory to decide the slavery question for themselves. Why did you not sound the alarm, and proclaim to the world that the sacred cause of freedom had been betrayed by northern doughfaces when you and your party in all the free States pledged yourselves to this principle in the presidential elections of 1852, and carried it into practical operation in the Washington territorial bill in 1853? If you are honest men, if you are sincere in your professions now, make an open and frank confession of your crimes then. If you do not wish to stand upon the record self-convicted of all the nefarious deeds which your malice imputes to others, let us hear no more of this hypocritical cant for political purposes about northern men introducing bills for the extension of slavery, when southern men could not be found to take the initiative. You know that it was not the object of the Nebraska bill, any more than of the Washington territorial bill, either to extend slavery or to circumscribe it. You all know that neither of those bills was intended either to establish, or abolish, or to introduce, or exclude slavery; but that the real object and true intent was to recognize in the Territories the great principle of self-government, in obedience to which the people of each State and Territory coming into the Union should decide for themselves what kind of institutions and laws were best adapted to their condition and welfare. It was in obedience to this great principle, the principle in defense of which the battles of the Revolution were fought, the principle for the preservation of which the Constitution of the United States was adopted, the principle of popular rights and State equality which underlies our whole system of representative Government, for the preservation of this great principle it was that the Washington and Nebraska bills were passed in the form in which they now appear on the statute-book.

The Senator from Ohio has appealed to the traditions of our fathers to sustain his position upon the slavery question. Well, sir, the tradition of our fathers is that the Declaration of Independence was proclaimed, and the Revolution effected for the purpose of enabling the American people to make their own laws, and establish their own institutions. The object, then, was to secure for the Colonies the same rights and privileges which the Nebraska recognizes and establishes in the Territories. Why, then, this assault upon northern men for their fidelity to the Constitution, and to those principles of self government and constitutional liberty, upon which our whole political system rests? The Senator has intimated the reason. He says the cry of disunion has no terror for him. That I can well understand. He, and those who act with him, do not consider themselves under any obligation to obey the Constitution, or to execute the laws made for the purpose of carrying it into effect, any further than they harmonize with their views on the slavery question. Abolitionism means disunion. Abolitionists are necessarily disunionists, for no sane man believes that this Union can be maintained by any other means than fidelity to the Constitution. The Constitution recognizes the right of each State to have slavery or not, as it chooses; the right of the State to abolish it when it pleases—to establish it when it chooses. The Constitution recognizes the right of a master of a slave to have him surrendered back if he escapes. If your consciences will not allow you to obey that Constitution, as honest men you are bound to dissolve the Union, and release yourselves from that obligation. Disunion has no terrors. The very declaration implies a willingness to see the act perpetrated whenever necessary to accomplish a cherished object. The Abolition movement means agitation, irritation, sectional strife, until alienation shall take the place of fraternal feeling. The leaders understand this, and hope to carry the masses with them by appeals to their prejudices and passions, until the fatal step shall be taken, before the real and final object shall be discovered, much less avowed. In the midst of all this Nebraska cry, they care no more for the provisions of that bill than they did for the Washington territorial bill when they voted for it. There is not a principle, there is not an objectionable provision, in the Nebraska bill, that you did not vote for in the Washington territorial bill eleven months before.

Then we may as well look this question directly in the face. It is a question of union or disunion. I repeat, no sane man believes that this Union can be preserved, except by fidelity to the Constitution. As long as the Constitution is carried out in its letter and in its spirit, and laws are passed and executed in obedience to its requirements, this Union is safe.

Then the question is, shall we be true and loyal to the Constitution? If we are, we will enforce all laws of the United States, passed in obedience to that instrument; and if there are combinations in States, Territories, localities, or anywhere to prevent the execution of those laws, we must apply the proper remedy. All new States must come into the Union on an equality with the old States. Whatever power under the Constitution may be exercised by any one State, may be exercised by each and all of the States, new and old alike. So long as Virginia has the right to retain or abolish slavery, Illinois and every other State has the same right, under the Constitution, to admit or exclude it in accordance with the wishes of her own people. When you attempt, therefore, to put a limitation on the new States which is not placed by the Constitution on all the States, you violate the great fundamental principle of equality among the States, and declare your unwillingness to abide by the compact that our fathers made.

Then, sir, what becomes of this cry about invading the rights of the North? I deny the right of a band of men, who have, in turn, joined and been kicked out of each of the great political parties because they were found to be unworthy to belong to either, and who have since formed a combination with all the factions and isms of the day, under the title of the fusion party, to come here and speak for the whole North. The North are a Union people, a law-abiding people, a people loyal to the Constitution, and willing to perform its obligations. Once in a while, a combination of factions, brought together under extraordinary circumstances, may procure a majority, and send a man here who is as much a misrepresentative of the sentiment of the North as he is of all the courtesies and proprieties which should exist among gentlemen here as well as elsewhere. I hold, sir, that such men have no right to speak in the name of the North or for the North. This Abolition faction, this disunion cabal, this set of men who make their reputation by slandering better men than themselves, have never been the true representatives of the North. They always come here by a bargain, and they go out at the end of the term at which they arrive. Sir, [turning to Mr. WADE,] you talk about your rebuke to northern men. I do not wish to speak unkindly to you, or to your colleague, [Mr. CHASE,] but your very colleague is to be succeeded by a Nebraska man, [Mr. Pugh,] a true representative of the North, for the next six years, in the Senate of the United States. You talk about your anti-Nebraska men in Ohio. You do not deny that every one of them came here by Know-Nothing votes. Why did you not boast, then, that there had not been a man elected to Congress from the free States who was not either a Nebraska man or sworn to violate the Constitution by proscribing a man for his religious faith? Why did you not say that every one of them was sworn to proscribe men because of the accident of birth, instead of because they were Nebraska men? Why did you not tell us that they came here because they had been baptized in the Know-Nothing crucible, and had taken all the unholy oaths of proscription forbidden by the Constitution? I have called upon any man in this Senate to specify a member of Congress, or of the Senate, from a free State, elected since the Nebraska bill was passed, who was not either a Nebraska man, or sent here by the Know-Nothing vote.

Then what is the use of pretending any more that the elections in the North turned on anti-Nebraska alone. How was it with my colleague, [Mr. SHIELDS,] whose case has been referred to in this debate? He voted for the Nebraska bill in obedience to the positive peremptory instructions of the Legislature of Illinois, first given in 1851, and then repeated while the Nebraska bill was pending here, and before he voted. Now they say they have defeated him because he voted for Nebraska. There is consistency for you. First instruct a man to do an act and then beat him for doing it. You profess to believe in the doctrine of instructions, and talk about Senators misrepresenting their constituencies. The fusion Legislature of Illinois at its recent session, or the popular branch of it, passed resolutions declaring it to be the imperative duty of a Senator to obey the instructions of the Legislature, and at the same time voted down a resolution approving the conduct of my colleague and myself in obeying a peremptory instruction! The truth is, my gallant and distinguished colleague was doomed to defeat before that Legislature, whether he voted for or against the Nebraska bill. He had been guilty of the crime of being born in Ireland! Any other obstacle could have been removed, any other offense pardoned in consideration of eminent public services rendered to the land of his adoption. All other stains upon his political character had been washed out with his own blood, so profusely shed in vindicating the rights and avenging the wrongs of his adopted country. All other offenses could be freely pardoned upon the score of patriotic services; but that monstrous offense of being born in a foreign land, and especially in old Ireland, was unpardonable in the eyes of Know-Nothingism, and hence the head of the gallant Senator was brought to the block. And yet we are told that his defeat was an anti-Nebraska victory. He was stricken down by a combination of all the factions and isms of the day, of which Abolitionism and Know-Nothingism were the controlling elements.

Unwilling to occupy more of the time of the Senate, I will take my seat, with the hope that I will not be induced, even by assaults upon my conduct and motives, to trespass more upon the time of the Senate.

Mr. BRAINERD. I will simply observe that I do not believe there were three hundred Know-Nothings in the State of Vermont at our last election; at any rate, if there were, I was not aware of the fact. I am here, therefore, certainly without any particular help, in any way, from any Know-Nothing.

RAILROAD IRON.

REMARKS OF HON. W. H. SEWARD,

OF NEW YORK,

IN SENATE, February 22, 1855.

The bill to authorize a credit of three years on Imported Railroad Iron being under consideration,

Mr. SEWARD offered the following amendment as an additional section:

SEC. —. And be it further enacted, That in order to extend to railroad companies who may use American iron in the construction of their railr ads, the same inducements as are granted by this act to companies to use for ign iron, whenever any railroad company shall make it appear to the satisfaction of the Secretary of the Treasury that they have purchased, for their own use, any iron rails, spikes, bolts, fastenings, or other iron necessary for the construction of railroads of American manufacture, it shall be the duty of the Secretary, and he is hereby authorized and directed, to loan to said company an amount equal to the duties for which credit will be given by this act upon similar iron if imported, paying over the same out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated: Provided, That said company shall secure the repayment of such loans by their bonds conditioned for the amount payable at three years from date, without interest, and by such other security, personal or otherwise, as, in the judgment of the Secretary, will indemnify the United States against loss.

I have offered this amendment because it will serve to illustrate my position in regard to the question before the Senate. Some abstractions have been discussed, on which I shall not dwell. If it were demonstrated that New Hampshire was the most loyal, and Pennsylvania was the most disloyal of the States, and even if the political differences of opinion between Massachusetts and South Carolina on questions of political economy were reconciled, yet all this would not affect the merits of the proposition to give a credit on railroad iron.

With the utmost deference, I cannot regard the suggestion of the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. Wells] to be one requiring grave refutation. He insists that the bill violates the Constitution. Congress have a right to levy taxes—either direct or indirect taxes. Since they have power to levy, they have power to remit—to remit altogether, or to remit on conditions, to give a credit for duties, or to require their immediate payment.

I see no question of free trade in the case before us. We have indeed been told that it would be well to abolish custom-houses, and come to direct taxation. It is very easy to say this, and it sounds very high and very sonorously. But, sir, in point of fact we shall sooner abolish the dome and even the skies over our heads, than we shall abolish the need of money, and of a great deal of money, too, to carry on the Government of a very great and rapidly growing empire. Government can raise money only by taxation upon human industry, for even realized wealth is only a production of human industry. Government can find human industry to levy taxes upon only in two places, namely abroad or at home. Thus the industry which must be taxed for the support of any Government is, either the industry of foreign nations, or the industry of its own country. Experience, old as the foundations of the Republic, and unchanging amid all vicissitudes, shows that the United States, following the example of all other nations, have taxed the industry of other countries instead of their own industry, as far as it has been practicable within the limits prescribed by their exigencies in regard to revenue. Senators, like theorists out of Congress, may speculate about abolishing custom-houses, but the practical course of the Government will continue the same until the end. We shall need money, and we shall tax the labor of the foreign miner, lumberman, farmer, mechanic, and artisan to the utmost before we begin to tax the labor of the American miner, lumberman, farmer, mechanic, and artisan. We may, indeed, reduce the duties on imported products of labor, but we shall do so only in the proportion that it can be done consistently with our wants of revenue. But this will not be free trade. It will only be abatement of taxation, with real or relative reduction of revenue. Absolute free trade may, indeed, come into the country, but it will only come when we are ready to dispense with revenues altogether. I ask Senators whether we have reached that time now, or whether they see such a time near at hand? No! No! You are even now, while talking of free trade, enlarging your Capitol, extending and embellishing the Federal city, augmenting and extending your public edifices, increasing your army and your navy, and your revenue service, and your fortifications, improving your rivers and harbors, constructing almost endless railroads, and organizing new Territories. You are, at the same time, raising the salaries of all the agents of the Government, civil and military, at home and abroad, and are not only extending your postal system across the western plains, and into the nooks of the western mountains, but also connecting it by steamships with all the postal systems of the Old World. While you are doing this, you raise not a dollar by direct taxation, and no one proposes, or thinks of proposing, taxation in that form, so greatly lauded by theorists, so instinctively avoided by all practical statesmen. It is preposterous to talk of instituting free trade at a time when you are thus going on more industriously than ever in increasing expenses.

Besides, freedom in trade, like freedom in every thing else, has a condition of equality attached to it. If you give universal freedom in trade, you give equal freedom in every department of trade. There must be freedom in the purchase and sale of all materials, and of all fabrics; free trade not only in iron, but in salt, in cotton, in wool, in silk, in wines, in grain, in hemp, in linen, in cattle, in everything. Nevertheless, you propose no such universal freedom as this here. There is no one here bold enough to abolish duties on foreign wheat, rye, corn, oats, sugar, wines, and liquors. No one dares propose to strike down altogether the discrimination which favors some branches of manufactures. Still less does any one propose to level down the wall that protects the farming interest.

What now is the principle of this bill? It assumes before me two aspects—first, as a bill for the encouragement of the construction of railroads. This is a policy which would be very judicious and wise in some circumstances. But it is not a judicious or wise policy now, under existing circumstances. It is not wise as here presented, because the encouragement proposed involves a burden not falling equally on all the industry of the country, but falling on one department of that industry only, namely, the iron manufacturing interest, and that department itself not only needs, but deserves, at least equal relief at the present conjuncture. The bill proposes to encourage railroads, not by simultaneously encouraging the domestic manufacture of iron, but by sending the railroad companies abroad to buy their iron in foreign markets, instead of sending them to our own furnaces and forges. It is, therefore, a bill to encourage and protect foreign miners and manufacturers of iron instead of encouraging American miners and manufacturers.

The amendment which I have offered seeks to correct that injustice. I know that the measure which it proposes is a novel one. But it seems to me to be defensible on every ground on which the main project contained in the bill can be defended. The forms of the two measures differ, but that is all; what the bill proposes is, in fact, a loan of the duties on foreign railroad iron for three years without interest. What my amendment proposes is also a loan of an equivalent amount for three years without interest, where railroad companies shall use American iron. In the one case, the favor extended to railroad companies is in the shape of forbearance from the collection of duties for three years; in the other, it is a loan of money for the same period, and on the same terms.

Incorporate my amendment, and I can very cheerfully vote for your bill. There is, indeed, another objection which arises from contemplating the other aspect of the bill. The bill is a relief law. It proposes an interposition by the Government to give temporary relief to a class of its industrious citizens who are laboring under financial embarrassment. Let us examine it closely. Either the law is to be executed according to its terms, or it is not. If it is to be so executed, then we shall give a credit only for three years, at the expiration of which period the duties are to be refunded. This credit amounts, as I understand, to about $1,000 a mile of the railroads which are now being built. The whole cost of building railroads is about $30,000 or $35,000 a mile.

Sir, will the railroad companies be less embarrassed three years hence than they are now? Will they be sounder and better able to pay then than now? Is anything more certain than it is that, if you stimulate forever, the sufferer will ultimately be exhausted? If by this process the railroad companies are pushed into deeper and more inextricable embarrassment, the relief will have failed. Then you must renew and extend the credit for a longer period, or remit the duties altogether.

But relief laws, always objectionable by reason of their very nature, are doubly objectionable when they are partial and discriminating. Other branches of industry are embarrassed not less than the railroad interest. Such is the case, especially with the woolen interest and the iron interest. They will come to you for relief, also; indeed they are here now importuning you for relief. Will you extend it to them? No; for that involves the necessity of raising duties instead of remitting or giving a credit for them. But these are as important and as meritorious as the railroad interest. They create wealth by converting unimproved resources into capital, while railroad companies create no wealth, but only favor its creation. I am not inimical to railroad enterprises; throughout my whole public life I have favored them, and I share now the suffering of those who have come here to urge this measure.

But I cannot go for such a discrimination as this in their favor. It is actually loaning them additional capital. The miners and forgers of iron in New Jersey, New York, Pennsylvania, and Virginia, want more capital, also. Capital is deranged in its flow through all the channels of industry and trade. It awards now the railroad builder, the wool manufacturer, and the miner and manufacturer of iron. You seek by this bill to direct it into the railroad channel again. But in just the same degree you would divert it from the other channels. Other interests complain, and justly complain, that not only all the embarrassments of railroad enterprises, but also all their own, result from too much partiality having been already exercised by Legislatures, State and National, towards railroad enterprises. The usury laws maintained everywhere with more or less stringency in regard to all other departments of industry, have been virtually suspended in favor of railroads. They are now enjoying the questionable advantages of being allowed to raise money at rates of twenty, twenty-five, thirty, or forty per centum in the money market, while the wool manufacturer, and the miner and forger of iron, is obliged to be content with offering only six, or seven, or ten per cent.

Besides this, the railroad interest has had the benefit of liberal grants of public lands, and of credits furnished by municipal corporations, towns, cities, and States.

It is, in fact, this partial legislation which has stimulated railroad building in such a degree that it has been carried to excess and extravagance, resulting in not only its own embarrassment, but also in the universal derangement of trade and industry.

What is proposed by the bill before us, is only a perseverance in the same policy that has produced the evils complained of. You may alleviate, but the money market has got to recover its equilibrium before you can restore soundness to the railroad department. Sir, railroad stock that is perfectly sure and ultimately sound, and is paying seven, or eight, or ten per cent. dividend, is depreciated ten per cent., while money can be borrowed at six or seven per cent. on private obligations. This shows conclusively that more than a due proportion of capital has gone into the construction of railroads. If you mean to relieve that department of industry, together with all others, you can only do it by leaving nature to work out her own cure; or else by returning to that generous system of equal discrimination in favor of all departments of industry.

The American people are strong and vigorous. Our Federal system of revenue is yet sound. The spirit of enterprise, although checked, is yet unimpaired. Leave all existing embarrassments of railroads to correct themselves, and the railroad companies, whose undertakings are feasible and judicious, will recover in due time. Any tampering with them will only continue the existing evils, and prevent the separation of those which can be saved from those which, ultimately, must end in ruin. I ask the yeas and nays on the amendment which I have offered.

EFFICIENCY OF THE NAVY.

SPEECH OF HON. J. MORTON,

OF FLORIDA,

In the Senate, February 26, 1855.

The bill to promote the efficiency of the Navy being under consideration,

Mr. MORTON said that he had intended to postpone any remarks which he had to make upon this question until a vote was taken on the amendment offered by the Senator from Maryland, [Mr. Pratt,] but as that amendment had brought into consideration generally the merits of the bill, he thought it proper he should say something at this time. It is not my habit [said Mr. M.] to enter into the discussion of bills general in their character. I have seldom or never obtruded myself upon the time and attention of the Senate, except in the consideration and discussion of bills of a local character, in which my constituents had a direct interest. I have always preferred that questions of general policy should be discussed by Senators more practiced in debate than myself; and if I felt doubt as to the vote I should give, I have listened to be informed by the remarks of the able Senators around me. I should not, Mr. President, have departed from that course now but for the fact that I was not in my seat when this bill first passed the Senate, and the enunciation of the journals of the day, which has been repeated by my colleague upon this floor, that it passed by a unanimous vote. That is all true in point of fact. The bill, as I understand it, was taken up during the morning hour on private bill day, and, eliciting no discussion, the attention of the Senate was not particularly drawn to its provisions, and it passed without opposition. Had I been present I should, at least, have recorded my vote against its passage.

I am opposed to the bill, Mr. President, in principle and in detail. An impression has gone abroad in the land, and pervades both Houses of Congress, that the personnel of the Navy is an inferior corps. This, in my humble estimation, is not the fact. It is said that there are many excrescences on the corps, and that the pruning-knife should be liberally applied. From this proposition, too, I dissent. The personnel of the American Navy never occupied higher ground than at the present time. It will compare most favorably with that of any other navy in the civilized world, in every respect. I believe, with the Secretary of the Navy, that "the corps is still full of chivalrous and gallant officers, who are not only ready for the post of danger, but would sustain the proud reputation of our Navy which has won so many laurels for our country, and by its brilliant victories cheered the heart of many a desponding patriot." This is but a just tribute to the officers of the Navy, who only require a proper opportunity and a proper cause to manifest to the world their gallantry and chivalry. Let such opportunity or cause offer, and my word for it, sir, as many laurels would be won now as were gained in the war of 1812.

The Navy, Mr. President, may require reform, but not in the way proposed by the bill under consideration. Have laws and regulations for its government that are well defined; increase the number of your ships, and let them be put in commission, thereby giving your officers active service; do these things first, and then direct your attention to the personnel of the Navy. It is said that many officers have not been in service for twenty or thirty years. Is this so? Where is the evidence? How many are there? With a pretty extensive acquaintance in the Navy, I know but a few, a very few, who have not been to sea within that time; and of those the most of them have served in all the different grades in the Navy, from that of a midshipman to the commodore of a squadron. There are some three or four who have not been to sea from physical disability, but that disability arose from the casualties of honorable service.

But, sir, admit that many officers have not been to sea for twenty or thirty years. What is the reason? It is because the policy of the Government has been not to have many vessels in commission at the same time. The records of the Navy Department will show that these very officers, or the greater part of them, have been constant applicants for service. Look at your Navy Register. You have sixty-eight captains, but you have not employment for more than twenty. You have ninety-seven commanders, but not employment for more than twenty-five or thirty. All these officers, as I before remarked, only require a proper occasion, and by their noble bearing they will not only decorate their brows with unfading laurels, but reflect the highest honor upon the service and the country.

But, Mr. President, let it be granted that the pruning-knife should be applied to the personnel of the Navy. Does this bill do it in the proper way? The President now has the power to do what this bill proposes, with the exception of increasing the number of officers of each grade. Can he not put officers on leave of absence or waiting orders? What is that but a reserved or retired list? Nearly one half of the officers are in that position now.

But, sir, this bill creates a board which, if not contrary to the letter of, is certainly against the spirit of, the Constitution and all the principles of our Government. It establishes a species of "star-chamber court," responsible to no one for the manner in which it discharges the high trust confided to it. Officers are to be brought into review before that court; their characters and service inquired into upon ex parte testimony, no opportunity offered them of being heard; not allowed to confront the witnesses, or to offer testimony to rebut false allegations against them. The first thing they know they will be struck down by an invisible blow, not discerning whence it came. It is a mere revival of that inquisitorial board of officers organized by Mr. Bancroft, when he was Secretary of the Navy, whose proceedings have never seen the light. It is well known that the officers constituting that board looked upon the duty required of them with loathing and disgust, as well as incompatible with the honor and dignity of gentlemen.

The board as now proposed is an irresponsible body; it is a "power behind the throne." The President is to act by and with its advice and consent, instead of counseling with this Senate, as provided for by the Constitution. If this board is necessary to enable the Executive to do his duty, certainly, Mr. President, this Senate should be consulted before its acts receive the full force of law.

There is not, Mr. President, a captain in the Navy at this time who did not belong to it in the war of 1812, when it fought itself, if not into existence, I may safely say into favor with the American people. Many of them served with Decatur, Bainbridge, Hull, Stewart, Jones, McDonough, Perry, Blakely, Biddle, Burroughs, and the other gallant spirits of that day, and assisted in achieving those victories which reflected so much honor upon our country, and raised the drooping spirits of our people at that eventful period. Their exploits are interwoven with and constitute the brightest pages of the nation's history. Shall there be a sad counterpart in our future annals on which it is to be recorded that these honored names are no longer worthy to stand in prominence upon our Naval Register? Many of them have received the thanks and other testimonials of Congress and of State Legislatures for their gallant and valiant deeds, and many of them will carry to their graves honorable wounds received in the service of the country. Those who did not distinguish themselves in that war only wanted the opportunity, and the evidence that they have performed well their part is that they are now occupying the highest grade in the Navy.

With one or two exceptions the captains of the Navy are now as vigorous and capable of performing honorable and useful service as the officers of any other grade. If it be the object to get rid of the officers now filling the rank of captain, and supply their places from the commanders, I warn, in a spirit of kindness, all parties concerned that the people of this country will never consent that an act of injustice shall be perpetrated upon men who have periled their lives in their country's cause for the purpose of promoting the interested and selfish views of their juniors. The captains of the Navy are known to the country. "They have been tried, and not found wanting;" and if we were to be so unfortunate to-morrow as to be involved in a maritime war, to whom would we look to command our fleets and squadrons? Certainly to that class of officers which it is the object of this bill to pull down and destroy. It is said that the commanders and lieutenants are exceedingly anxious that this bill should become a law. If it be so, I tell them in a friendly voice, to use a common expression, "they are cutting their own throats." They are advocating a system which will in a short time permit them to enjoy the sweets of retirement, when they will be able to say that "the post of honor is a private station." They are not to be the officers to whom the country is to look in future. We are told, sir, by the Committee on Naval Affairs—

"The Naval Academy has given and is giving to the country officers not only thoroughly educated for the duties of the service, but whose character would adorn any profession. These are the men who will be called upon, in the command of our fleets and ships, not only to contend with the ability and advancement of European navies, but as the protectors of the rights of American citizens and property in foreign seas and foreign countries. A knowledge of the institutions, government, and commercial systems of maritime Powers, and a general acquaintance with the laws of nations, and of the rights, duties, and obligations under them will be demanded of them." (See p. 8, Senate Reports of Committee on Naval Affairs, 1st session, 33d Congress.)

Now, Mr. President, the commanders, lieutenants, and passed midshipmen have not had the advantages of an education at the Naval Academy, which seems, in the estimation of the committee, to be essentially necessary for the command of our fleets and ships. It is true the academy has not been in existence more than seven or eight years, but it has already sent forth graduates enough to fill the two higher grades, and when we have such high qualifications and experience in the service, why should not the country avail itself of it? The world, Mr. President, is progressive; there is a short road to science and literature, and why should there not be to seamanship and the other qualifications necessary to make a perfect naval officer? There is such a road, sir, or at least the Committee on Naval Affairs say so, and I am the last man to question their scientific and practical information. That road is an education at the Naval Academy. Take a boy, sir, who had never seen a ship; let him remain four years at Annapolis, making during the time one or two trips in the summer across the Atlantic in the practice ship: he goes forth duly qualified to command fleets and ships, to act as a negotiator of treaties, a warrior, judge, and pacificator—an officer that would throw your Hulls, Bainbridges, Stewarts, and the officers of the war of 1812 into the shade!

Now, Mr. President, I do not pretend to question the correctness of all this, for the Naval Committee tell us so, and they know; but, at the same time, I must be pardoned if I should suggest to my friends amongst the commanders, lieutenants, and passed midshipmen, that, inasmuch as they have not had the advantage of these short-cuts to a knowledge of their profession, they should rest quiet and wait until they are promoted in regular order, as were their predecessors. The "scientifics" will be close upon their heels, and we shall hear them say, "we can't wait." "Did not Perry fight the battle of Lake Erie when he was twenty-eight years old, McDonough that of Lake Champlain at thirty-one? And was not Stewart, when he captured two ships, the Levant and Cyane, with the Constitution, but thirty-nine, and Bainbridge, when he took the Java, only thirty-one? And these heroes were not so well qualified as we are, they never having had the advantages of a scientific education at the Naval Academy at Annapolis."

I am by no means, Mr. President, opposed to the Naval Academy. I think it all right that we should prepare our young men by a proper education previous to their entering upon the practical duties of their profession. I merely mention the Naval Academy to illustrate to those officers who are so urgent for the passage of this bill what they in turn may very speedily expect. If these gentleman will have a little patience, and wait for that Providence which rules over the destinies of men, the senior war-scarred officers will be retired soon enough; and when they do go they will not have to say that, after having fought the battles of the country and faithfully and honorably served her in every part they were called to act, they were chagrined, mortified, and degraded because their juniors desired their places.

I have said, Mr. President, that if this bill passes it will accomplish nothing but what the Executive has the power to do without its intervention. It will be nothing more than the creation of a class of hermaphrodite officers, making some commanders captains, who will neither be captains nor commanders, and some lieutenants commanders, who will neither be commanders nor lieutenants. The system would form a class of officers unknown to the laws. If a man is a post captain he is entitled to all the pay, rights, and privileges of a captain, and so with commanders and lieutenants. When one of the captains proposed by this bill goes to sea he does not get the pay provided for his rank; he only gets $2,800 per year in command of a frigate, while the regular post captain would receive, for exactly the same service, $3,500; and when the two are waiting orders or on leave of absence, one will receive $2,500 and the other 1,800. One of these nondescripts might be in command of a seventy-four gun ship, receiving $2,800 per year, and a regular captain be in command of a thirty-six gun frigate, receiving $3,500 per year, and both serving in the same squadron. Why this inequality, requiring the same service and responsibility of both, and yet pay one seven hundred dollars less than the other? It is, Mr. President, not only wrong, but unjust in all points of view. If an officer is a captain or commander, give him the pay provided now by law for such rank; he is entitled to it upon every principle of justice, and it is wrong to withhold it from him.

We are told, Mr. President, that this bill will not increase the aggregate cost of the personnel of the Navy; that it is so arranged that it will not require an additional cent of appropriation. Well, sir, this is a most extraordinary discovery, and the gentleman who made it ought to receive the most profound gratitude of the country. Congress is asked to perpetrate an act of injustice, create heart-burnings and jealousies in the Navy, because it will not be a charge upon the public purse. If, Mr. President, this reform and reorganization be required in the Navy, why should it be measured by dollars and cents? Money cannot compensate us if the national honor is tarnished, and the stars and stripes hauled down in disgrace in a naval contest. It amounts to this, and the friends of the bill cannot say any more or less; the personnel of our Navy is inefficient, decrepid, and behind the times; it requires reform and reorganization, but it must not cost a dollar beyond the present sum required for its support. If it does cost more the present organization will do well enough. Now, such logic as this will not do for the American people. Our constituents, Mr. President, look upon the Navy as a great element of national defense, and will not be satisfied if we estimate its efficiency by its cost. When the advocates of this measure have to resort to such arguments as have been advanced, there cannot be much merit in, or necessity for, this boasted reform.

I am, Mr. Ptesident, for paying the officers in the service of the country the full amount to which their rank entitles them, so that they may support the dignity of the position and fully maintain the honor of the flag either abroad or at home. How humiliating will it be, sir, to one of these new captains, when he returns from a cruise of two or three years, having commanded one of the largest ships in the Navy, to find that he is embarrassed, having absorbed all his pay in maintaining the honor and dignity of the flag of his country, and then settle down on a commander's leave-of-absence pay! If you promote these officers in the manner proposed, in the name of justice I ask you to make no discrimination in the pay. Give them the pay which the law prescribes for the rank. Pass this bill in its present shape, and eighteen months will not elapse before you will have petitions on your table to increase the pay to which the rank entitles him, and complaining loudly of the injustice of the inequality of the pay of officers of the same grade. The time of the Senate and House that will be taken up in the consideration of those petitions will be worth more to the country than the cost of the difference of pay which you propose to save by this bill.

The board, Mr. President, is to be composed of five officers of the three higher grades, and no officers are to examine into and report upon the efficiency of a grade above them. When the efficiency of the captains is inquired into, I presume the senior captains will have their characters, qualifications, and efficiency examined into by five of their juniors; for it is to be presumed that the Executive will select from each grade none but officers about whom there can be no question as to the propriety of their remaining on the active service list. Now, sir, this board is to inquire into the capacity of the officers promptly and efficiently to discharge all the duties, both on shore and afloat, which may be required of them; and, if incompetency should arise, in the judgment of the board, from any cause implying sufficient blame on the part of the officer to justify it, they shall be recommended to be stricken from the roll of the Navy. Just imagine, Mr. President, the gallant Stewart, (Old Ironsides,) the only officer on the Navy list who was a captain at the commencement of the war of 1812, who, with Commodores Hull and Bainbridge, prevented the ships of the Navy from being laid up in ordinary; a man for whom the brevet rank of admiral ought to be created for his gallant deeds and long and meritorious service; imagine, I say, this gallant officer passing in review before five juniors, (no matter how the board is constituted, they must be his juniors,) and they should say that he is incompetent to promptly and efficiently discharge all duty that might be required of him, both afloat and on shore. The board would have to inquire into the causes of the disability, and if, in their opinion, (he not being heard,) it proceeded from any cause implying sufficient blame on his part to justify it, they would be bound to recommend that his name be stricken from the roll of the Navy. Again, this board has not only to inquire into the mental, but the physical condition of the officers. Then, sir, there should be surgeons on the board to examine into their physical condition. Certainly, the board as now constituted, will be incompetent to decide upon the physical qualities of an officer. Will it not be a beautiful spectacle, sir, to see one of our captains, who participated in the victories of the war of 1812, passing before this board, composed of his juniors, the most, if not all, of whom never smelt gunpowder, except in the firing of a salute, stript to the buff (as they do raw recruits) to ascertain his physical condition. The gout, I am told, is hereditary, but that it sometimes passes over a generation and visits the succeeding one. Now, suppose that an officer's father had the gout, and the officer, relying upon the theory that the disease would pass by him, had occasionally indulged in liberal libations of Southside Madeira, and had fared sumptuously when he was on shore, and the gout should be the consequence. Why, sir, this gout, which he inherited from his father, and therefore his misfortune and not his fault, might in the estimation of this board, render him incompetent to perform his duty on shore or afloat, and it might decide that this incompetency arose from a cause implying sufficient blame on his part to justify it, and therefore they would be bound to recommend that his name should be stricken from the rolls.

But it is unnecessary for me, Mr. President, to point out what this board can or will do. It is organized upon a wrong principle, one that is violative of all right and in direct opposition to those great constitutional privileges which are enjoyed by the citizen for his protection. Why, sir, if a citizen is prosecuted for a simple assault, he is entitled to a speedy and public trial, by an impartial jury. He must know the nature and cause of the accusation; he must be confronted with the witnesses against him; he is entitled to compulsory process for obtaining witnesses in his favor and the assistance of counsel for his defense. No judge will or can preside in a matter where he has the most remote interest; no juror who has formed and expressed an opinion on a case is competent; no member of Congress or of a State Legislature will vote upon a question in which he has a personal interest. Organize this board as you will, its acts must be in conflict with all these constitutional and dearly-cherished guarantees. The members of the board will be directly interested in their decisions unless you take the five senior officers of each grade. Of this there is no prospect. If you take junior captains they are interested in getting their seniors out of the way. So with the commanders and the lieutenants. It does not follow, Mr. President, because the naval profession is highly honorable that its member are not subject to all the passions, feelings, and prejudices that we are; they are nothing more or less than poor human nature, and we have no right to expect that they will differ from the rest of the world. We should not lead into temptation, as this bill will certainly do, the officers who will, in all probability, compose this board.

By the law, Mr. President, governing the organization of courts-martial and courts of inquiry, where the accused has an opportunity to confront his accuser, cross-examine witnesses for the prosecution, and introduce testimony on his defense, a majority of the court must, if the exigency of the service will permit, be his seniors. There is no such provision for this inquisitorial "star-chamber court." The junior officers of each grade can be taken; and in the case of the captains they must necessarily call in question the character, qualifications, and habits of their seniors.

It appears to me, sir, that no officer of a proper spirit would sit upon such a board. The duty must be one from which all honorable men will shrink with disgust. What, sir, sit in judgment in secret, and criticise the character of brother officers who have served with them, under all circumstances, and have been their shipmates for many a long cruise, shut out from family, friends, and country! I cannot think that the gallant spirits of our Navy will willingly embark in any such disgusting duty.

We have heard lately, Mr. President, in this Chamber and elsewhere, something in the shape of scathing and scornful denunciations of secret conclaves and midnight associations to take away men's constitutional rights, and invade their political privileges. Will you imitate that system which you recently deemed so deserving of your scorn and indignation? Will you give the sanction of law to a secret and inquisitorial body? I can scarcely think that all the consequences of this method of dispatching the time-honored veterans of the Navy have been seriously considered by this Senate, heretofore viewed as the "palladium of our liberty."

It is acknowledged, sir, by the friends of the bill, that it is not perfect, and that it may require further legislation to make it so. Yes, sir, it is not perfect; and twelve months will not roll around before there will be petitions on your table asking its repeal, and praying that the personnel of the Navy may be put in statu quo. A year will not revolve before you hear loud complaints from the service, and amongst the advocates for the measure now you will find a majority of them hereafter denouncing it.

It is not advisable, sir, at this late period of the session, to pursue these remarks. My object was to make known to the Senate, to the country, and to my constituents, my opposition to this bill; to let them know that I think it manifestly unjust to the officers of the Navy, subjecting them to a humiliation which is unnecessary and uncalled for; that it accomplishes nothing, or but little, but what the Executive can do without its enactment. He has the right to keep them on leave-of-absence pay, and if they are not worthy to pass them by in promotion. He has the right, or at least he exercises the right, of striking officers from the roll of the Navy. It is but a day or two since he struck from the rolls a most gallant and chivalric officer. I do not mention this fact as a censure of the Executive, but to show to the Senate and to the country that he claims and exercises the power that this bill proposes to give him.

I shall not do now, Mr. President, what I intend during the progress of this bill—move its indefinite postponement. I shall not do it at this time, as my friend from Maryland wishes to have a vote upon his amendment, which, if the bill pass at all, I think it is nothing but just and proper should be adopted. I consider if reform be wanting in any branch of the service, it is required as much in the medical corps as any other attached to the Navy. In time of peace there is no corps in the service which requires more efficient and well qualified officers than the medical. I shall, after the vote is taken upon the amendment proposed by the Senator from Maryland, move the indefinite postponement of the bill.

INCREASE OF THE ARMY.

SPEECH OF HON. T. H. BENTON,

OF MISSOURI,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

February 27, 1855,

On the proposition to raise four new Regiments for the regular Army.

Mr. BENTON said:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: This large proposed increase of the regular army comes from an Executive recommendation on account of Indian hostilities, and is an intended permanent increase for an admitted temporary exigency. This is illogical, and implies some design beyond the object avowed. I like the proposed substitute of our Committee of Ways and Means much better, which is to raise volunteers for a limited time; and still better I like the proposal which I shall submit, and which is to raise a temporary force of mounted rangers. Both these substitutes—the volunteers and the rangers—are each preferable to this permanent increase of regulars, if the Indian war is the real object; for either of these kind of troops would be much sooner raised, more efficient in the field, and cheaper, because disbanded as soon as done with. The Executive communication contemplates a great army of Indians assembling from many tribes, which we shall have to fight: that is a groundless supposition. There is no Indian army anywhere, and will be none. The time has gone by when Indians can assemble, and form an army, and fight battles, as with St. Clair, and Wayne, and Braddock. Neither their numbers nor their means of subsistence will admit of such assemblages now. Predatory expeditions, attacks upon families, upon travelers, upon hunters and traders, is all that is to be looked for now; and of that we have more than ever was seen before, and with more cruelty than has been witnessed in half a century. These depredations extend now from the Mississippi to the Pacific ocean; from Texas and New Mexico to California; from Kansas, Nebraska, and Minnesota, to Oregon and Puget's Sound. Never was such a universality of Indian war seen before! and much of it of recent origin, where Indians have always been peaceable. Lewis and Clark went to the Pacific with forty-five men, and returned safe, receiving hospitality all the time. Frémont, with an average of twenty-five men, made thirty thousand miles of wilderness explorations, without collision with Indians; and aided by them: emigrants to Oregon, for a long time, went safe—themselves, their flocks and herds. The same of the emigration to California, and the intercourse with New Mexico. All safe until lately. Now every path is infested; emigration almost suspended; the great western trade in stock quite broken up; massacres on every line of travel; and some of them with a savage barbarity of which there is no parallel since the old cruel times when prisoners were tortured, and roasted alive, and tormented to death.

Why this universal hostility where there had been so much peace? Why this universal war when the Indians have become so much weaker, and we so much stronger? Why this universal Indian war when there is no foreign war to incite it? Why this revival of savageism in killing with torture when so much had been done to soften the Indian temper and customs? Why such a change in so many tribes which had been so long peaceable? There is a change, a great change, and there must be a cause for it. What is it? Sir, it is my prerogative to answer that question. I have the knowledge, and the courage to do it. My local position, beyond the Mississippi, enables me to know; my temper, if not duty, incites me to know; my sources of information are radical and primary, face to face with men who do know, and admitting of no mistake. I will tell the reason.

First, the removal of faithful, experienced Indian officers, (agents and superintendents,) and putting into their places ignorant, unfit, mendicant politicians. Secondly, sending our school-house officers and pot-house soldiers to treat the Indians as beasts and dogs. These are the two causes, and I will verify them before I sit down. I consider what I say, and shall verify it. The ignorance and negligence of the politicians sent out as agents and superintendents, is one great cause of these unprecedented Indian hostilities; the ignorance and misconduct of our army officers and soldiers is another, and the greatest of the two. The first is self-evident, beginning with the Indian commissioner here, and following down the appointments until they run into the ground. The second is provable, and I proceed to prove it, taking the two eminent instances—those which make this call for troops—the Apache and the Sioux war—for my illustrations. Does any member here know when this Apache war began? I presume not. Then I will tell him. It began on the first day of August, in the year 1849—five years and a half ago. Does any one know where it began? I think not—and I will tell him. It began at a United States military post in a Mexican village called the Moro, or Las Vegas, (which signifies the meadows,) about one hundred miles this side of Santa Fé, and on the traveling route between New Mexico and Missouri. There is where it began. Does any one here know how it began? I am certain no one does. Then I will tell him, and prove it. It began thus: A party of Jicarilla (Hee-ca-reel-yah) Apaches, at the time mentioned, consisting of about forty persons, chiefly women, children, and boys, comprising the families of ten or twelve men, came into the Moro to trade—their usual place of trading, and nearest to the country they inhabit on the head waters of the streams flowing into the Red river and the Arkansas. The captain in command at the place took it into his head—I believe I should say West Point head, for such an idea could have gone into no other head—"that the true object of this visit of the Indians was to inform themselves of the strength of the garrison and other defenses of the place, with a view to an attack upon it at some future time." With this idea in his head, and a sword by his side, and brimfull of tactics, he acted upon the conception promptly, militarily, and energetically. He sent out a sergeant to order the Indians off. Not feeling the force of the command, the Indians continued their purchases, especially of powder and lead, always their first want, as the subsistence of their families depend upon killing game. Hearing this contumacy the officer sent out his sergeant again, with fifteen armed soldiers, with orders to bring the disobedient party into his fort. Seeing the armed force approach, the Indians began to move off; and the officer, seeing them move off, mounted his whole force of dragoons and put them on the pursuit. The Indians fled, the dragoons pursued. The flight and pursuit continued eight miles, women and children massacred all the way. As they fled through the long, scattered village of Moro, the Indians called out to the Mexicans: "What are the Americans killing us for?" To which the astonished Mexicans gave that eternal Spanish answer in all cases of dubiosity: "Quien sabe?" Who knows? The results of the pursuit and slaughter, or "battle," as it was militarily called, were, twenty-three Indians killed, consisting almost entirely of women, children, and boys, and one sucking babe; one "full grown Indian" captured, but who escaped; six prisoners brought into the fort, to-wit, three squaws, all wounded, one of them a young woman of eighteen, whose babe had been killed in the "battle;" and three boys, wounded. On the side of the United States troops, none were killed, and three or four wounded, and they with arrows. The prisoners were detained in the fort, where their wounds were dressed by the garrison surgeon; and the young woman, for want of a child to draw off the milk from her fevered breast, performed that office for herself.

Thus twenty-three Indians were killed; six were prisoners; and any one who knows anything of Indian law, or Indian nature, knows that two principles are deep seated in their bosoms: hospitality, and revenge. They give food to the hungry; they avenge an injury. Blood for blood is their law, and their nature. If the slayer is of their own tribe, they take him; or one of his kin if he flees; if of another tribe, they take any of the tribe; if of the white race, the revenge falls upon any of the race—and fall upon some one it surely will. Here was a case for the fulfillment of that law—twenty-three dead and six prisoners to avenge, and the white race to pay the penalty. The United States soldiers who had shed the blood, and drawn down this vengeance, and all the United States troops in New Mexico, were safe—securely protected in their well barred and strong built forts. Travelers and settlers were to receive the blow: and soon they had it. Early in October following that bloody 1st of August, a traveling party of half a dozen persons, near the Point of Rocks on the Santa Fé road, between the Moro and the Arkansas river, were massacred—one woman and child carried off alive, afterwards known to be the hapless and unfortunate Mrs. White. Same time, and near the same place, a party of some thirty Mexicans, all men, returning from a hunting expedition, were attacked by a large body of Indians, four of their number killed, and some wounded. At the same time a party of eleven Americans (among them Mr. Hugh N. Smith, the New Mexican Delegate in Congress) arrived at the same place, on their way to the United States, and only escaped attack and destruction by falling in with the defeated Mexicans. These, just escaped from a bloody field, warned the party of their danger, and pointed to the smoke rising from the camp-fires of the Indians a few miles ahead on the trail, lying in wait for new victims, and alluring them on by the sight of what would indicate, in such a place, the hospitable camp of some traveling party. Upon this warning all returned together, Mexicans and Americans, to the Moro, and Mr. Smith's party applied to the commanding officer for an escort of dragoons as far as the Arkansas river—which covered the most dangerous part of the ground. The officer refused it, alleging want of authority, and interference with some warlike plan which he had conceived—refused the national protection to citizens on whose heads he had himself brought down the danger. Mr. Smith went back one hundred miles to Santa Fé to get an order for the escort from the superior officer at that place; that officer refused to give the order, but left it to the discretion of the commander at the Moro to give the escort or not, as he pleased. He pleased not to give it; and so the eleven Americans remained waiting for other travelers to come along, and make up a party strong enough to go through. In the mean time the United States mail from Santa Fé came on: hearing of the danger ahead, the carrier applied for an escort, which the officer refused to give: and so the mail stopped and waited with the rest. While waiting, Mr. F. X. Aubrey, well known as an enterprising trader and traveler in New Mexico, arrived at Las Vegas from Missouri, and applied to the commander for an escort to enable him to bring forward his goods, (principally groceries and liquors,) of which he had made a cache, as the traders call it, (a hidden deposit,) on the Cimarone river, near the Arkansas, until he could get a guard for his wagons. The officer gave him the escort, a troop of twenty-five dragoons, commanded by a second sergeant—a lieutenant's command confided to a second sergeant! Under this protection—this liquor escort—the party of Mr. Smith and the mail resumed their journey to the United States. By this time it was known that a woman and a child had been carried off alive at the massacre of the traveling family, and the officer determined to make some sort of effort to recover the captives. For this purpose he sent with his detachment one of his squaw prisoners, to go as far as the place of the massacre, and to be instrumental in some way in getting back the captive mother and child; and for which service the prisoner squaw was to have her freedom. Arrived at the Point of Rocks, the squaw claimed her liberty. The sergeant said it was the place, but not the time; that she was to be set free there on her return; and directed her to get in the wagon in which she was transported. The squaw refused; force was applied. She resisted; arms were used—a knife on the part of the squaw, pistols and carbines on the side of the dragoons. It was a fierce contest, but numbers and arms gave the victory to the dragoons. The squaw was knocked down with the butt of a gun, but rose and rushed at her foes. She was fired at with a horse pistol, struck on the head with a ball, and fell; but rose again, and rushed at the soldiers, "scattering them in every direction." Then the carbine was brought into play, and the woman, fired upon from a safe distance, was killed with rifle bullets—it having been easy to have secured her each time that she fell. Her leather garments were cut into thongs for whip lashes, and the naked body left on the ground for the wolves to eat, which they did; and a party coming along shortly after, in which there was a physician, he, examining the skeleton—picked clean of flesh, skin, and muscle—pronounced it to be that of a female, but of what race he knew not. It was the skeleton of the captive Indian woman, wounded and made prisoner of war in the "battle" of the 1st of August, and killed in the combat of November 1st with the twenty-five dragoons.

And this is the end of the first chapter in the Jicarilla Apache war; and how I came to know it all may now be a question with some. I can assure them it was not by reading official reports, either from officers to the Secretaries at War, or from the Secretaries to Congress. It was by reading the Santa Fé Gazette, where my attention was first awakened; then by conversing with persons familiar with the scenes; and from written responsible accounts from those who knew, drawn up at my request, and given to me for public use. And I will now use one of these statements, drawn up by Mr. J. W. H. Patton, of Independence, Missouri—a gentleman to me well known, and for whose veracity I vouch. (This statement was not read in the delivery of the speech, for want of time, its contents only given; but is now inserted in full as the testimony of an eye-witness, competent and credible, and whose statement will be corroborated by the general voice of the country, and by the special statement of numerous persons equally cognizant of the facts, and whose names Mr. Patton gives.)

"About the 8th or 10th of August, 1849, I arrived at Las Vegas, New Mexico, on my way from Independence, Missouri, to Santa Fé, in company with Benjamin F. Thomson and his train of merchant wagons. Having learned from some travelers whom we met on the road, that a battle had been fought at Las Vegas, between the United States troops stationed there and a band of the Jicarilla tribe of Apache Indians, we made inquiries concerning the difficulty, and were informed by some of the citizens and soldiers of the place—both classes agreeing in their statements—that, about ten days previous to our arrival, viz: about the 1st of August, 1849, a party of the Jicarilla Indians, numbering about forty, a large proportion of the number being women, youths, and children, came into the town, under a sub-chief, with the avowed purpose of making a treaty of friendship with the military commander at that post. The commander informed them that he would make no treaty except with the head chiefs of the tribe; and believing, as he said, that the true object of this visit of the Indians was to inform themselves as to the strength of the garrison, and other defenses of the place, with a view to an attack upon it at some future time, (upon what he predicated his suspicion I do not now remember,) he ordered them off from the town. Instead of obeying this order, they dispersed in various directions through the village, trying to make purchases of powder and lead. The commander being informed of their efforts to procure ammunition, immediately dispatched a sergeant with a detachment of fifteen soldiers, with orders to bring the Indians before him for the purpose of being further examined as to their intentions. The Indians, seeing the armed soldiery approaching them, precipitately fled from the town; whereupon the commander ordered his whole company of dragoons to mount and pursue them, which they did, engaging with them a short distance from the town, and keeping up a running fight for the distance of eight miles. In the engagement twenty-three Indians were killed, including many women and children, and seven prisoners were taken, consisting of one full grown Indian, who subsequently made his escape, three squaws, and three youths, all of whom, I believe, were wounded. Of the United States troops, three or four were wounded with arrows.

"Captain Judd was military commander at Las Vegas at the time of the occurrence above mentioned. The garrison consisted of one company of Flying Artillery, but the company was mainly used as dragoons. —— Burnside was first lieutenant of the company. The names of the other officers of the company I do not now remember.

"In company with B. F. Thomson and Lieutenant Burnside, I visited the guard-house in which the Indian prisoners above mentioned were confined. On entering, we found the surgeon dressing a wound upon the shoulder of the youngest of the squaws, (who appeared to be eighteen or twenty years of age,) and at the same time, she was drawing the milk from her breast. Mr. Thomson asked where her child was. Lieutenant Burnside remarked in reply: 'I was taught by my mother that nits breed lice.' Her child had been killed in battle. Among the other prisoners was a woman apparently about forty years of age, and her two sons, respectively about nine and twelve years of age. The woman last spoken of will again be mentioned of in the course of my narrative.

"Returning from Santa Fé to Missouri in company with a party of ten besides myself, consisting of Hugh N. Smith, who was on his way to Washington city as Delegate to Congress from New Mexico, B. F. Thomson, John Corbet, Squire Asbury, Captain Papan, Mr. Miller, Grace Dale, two Mexican servants, and another person whose name has escaped my memory, we arrived at Las Vegas about the 6th of October, following the date of the occurrences above spoken of, and started across the plains from that place about the 14th. When about three days travel out from the eastern border settlements of New Mexico, and at a place on the road known as 'the Point of Rocks,' we met a party of thirty or forty Mexicans returning from buffalo hunting, who informed us that, about twelve miles back, on the road they came, they saw the bodies of five or six Americans who had been murdered by the Jicarilla Indians; and that a large party of the same tribe had attacked them (the hunters) the evening previous, killing three of their number and wounding several others. They showed us their wounded companions, and Mr. Thomson, of our party, extracted some arrow points from their wounds. The hunters, pointing back in the direction from whence they came, called our attention to the smoke arising from the camp fires of the Indians, who, they said, were encamped in a strong body upon the road. Thereupon we made an effort to induce them to return with us, and assist in routing the Indians, promising that we would afterwards escort them back to the place where we then were stopped; but they refused, and proceeded on their way to Don Fernandez de Taos, where they told us they belonged. We then counseled among ourselves whether we should proceed on our journey, and brave the danger, or return to Las Vegas and report what we had heard relative to the hostility of the Indians and the murder of American citizens by them, and ask of commander Judd an escort of troops to accompany us through the country of the Jicarillas. The question being put to vote, it was decided that we should return. We reached Las Vegas again about the 20th. I neglected to state in the proper place, that having before heard that James M. White, his lady, child, two servants, a negro man and woman, and three others—eight in all—were on the road, traveling in carriages in advance of their train; and from the description given us by the Mexicans, of the persons murdered and their traveling equipage, we were convinced that it was Mr. White and party who had fallen into the hands of the Indians.

"Immediately upon our arrival at Las Vegas, we informed the commander of all these facts, and requested him to send an escort with us to the scene of disaster, and further, if, upon our arrival there, the information obtained from the hunters should be confirmed by ocular proof. Captain Judd excused himself by saying that he was not authorized by his instructions from the commander at Santa Fé to furnish escorts to citizens returning to the States; and that to grant our request would interfere with a plan that he had in view of making an incursion into the Euta country. Upon this we dispatched one of our party, H. N. Smith, to Santa Fé, for the purpose of asking Colonel Washington, who was at that time commander-in-chief of that department, to furnish us an escort. Colonel Washington declined, but sent Captain Judd discretionary authority to act in the matter as he might think best. In the mean time, the regular monthly mail from Santa Fé for Fort Leavenworth, Missouri, arrived at Las Vegas, and the carriers refused to go further without more men. Mr. Smith returned, and presented Colonel Washington's letter to Captain Judd, who still hesitated to send his men upon the plains, until F. X. Aubrey reached Las Vegas from the States, bringing information that, on account of losing a part of his teams, he was obliged to cache two loads of his goods on the Cimerone river, when Captain Judd concluded to send an escort with us, and wagons and teams to bring in Mr. Aubrey's goods. The merchandise consisted of groceries and liquors. Mr. Aubrey also confirmed the previous information of the murder of Mr. White and all his party, excepting his wife and child, who, it was concluded, had been made prisoners by the Indians.

"In order to try and recover Mrs. White and child, the Indian woman, who, with her two sons, mentioned before, was prisoner in Las Vegas, was to be placed in charge of the escort, to accompany them as far out as they were going, and returning with them again as far as the place where the murder was committed, was to be placed upon a horse, and let go to her tribe, with a message from Captain Judd to her tribe, to the effect, that if the Indians would send Mrs. White and child to him, he would release all the Indian prisoners confined at Las Vegas, and give them five good horses to take to their chiefs.

"Accordingly we again left Las Vegas about the 1st of November, accompanied by an escort of twenty-five dragoons, under the command of the second sergeant of the company, whose name I do not remember, (it begins, I think, with 'Van,') the Indian woman and the party carrying the mail.

"When we arrived at the Point of Rocks, the woman indicated to the sergeant in command that, according to her understanding of the captain's orders, (and the orders had been given in her presence, and interpreted to her,) she was then to be let go free. She was evidently sincere in her interpretation of the orders, but was mistaken; and upon the sergeant's telling her that it was the place, but not the time, and explaining to her, as well as he could, that it was his duty to retain her in his custody until his return to that place, and then release her, she, after weeping bitterly for awhile, became apparently reconciled This occurred in the evening after we had encamped for the night. Next morning, when all things were ready for a start, the woman was, as usual, ordered by the man who drove the wagon in which she rode, to get into the wagon, whereupon she drew a butcher knife, which she had managed to procure and conceal about her person during the night, and sprang at the driver, aiming a blow at his breast, which he barely escaped. She then plunged the knife into the bowels of two or three of the mules attached to one of the wagons, when she was felled to the ground by one of the soldiers, with the butt of his gun. She soon recovered from the blow, and springing to her feet, rushed towards the men, scattering them in every direction, but injuring no one. The soldiers recovered themselves, and made ready their fire-arms, and one of them, as the woman still approached, leveled a holster pistol at her head, and fired. The ball struck its mark, and felled its victim—but having glanced, it only stunned her. She recovered before the men, who were slow in approaching her, could secure and bind her. She sprang again to her feet, and with knife uplifted in her hand, bounded towards her enemies with the ferocity of a wounded tigress, when the word 'fire' was given, and she fell, pierced through the heart by a ball from a carbine. I think she might have been easily secured each time when she was felled to the ground previous to being killed; but the most intense excitement prevailed throughout the camp. We left her unburied, after her deer skin shirt had been removed from her body by one of the teamsters, to be applied to making whip lashes. After traveling about twelve miles from the place of this horrible scene, we came to the place where Mr. White and party had been killed; and collecting their remains, as well as we could, buried them, and proceeded on our way, meeting with no other incident worthy of note."

Such is the narrative of Mr. Patton, veracious on its face, known to be true, and provably so by many witnesses. There were now twenty-four Jicarillas dead, as brutally, as dastardly, as wantonly murdered as ever human beings were—and all done by pot-house soldiers, led by sergeants, under the orders of school-house officers, inflated with military command; and here ends the first chapter of the Jicarilla war. But there is a sequel to it worthy of its origin, and which I proceed to give.

The superior officer in command in that quarter very laudably determined to make an expedition for the recovery of Mrs. White, and if he had only left himself, his dragoons, and his artillery behind it would have been successful. He made up an hundred men—forty dragoons, sixty Mexicans, and one twelve pounder, with Carson and Leroux for guides. Knowing the haunts of the Indians, the guides went straight to them, and came on them in fourteen days. The camp was in a deep hollow on a head water of the Red river. Carson and Leroux were ahead with the Mexicans, on a sharp look-out, the signs being fresh, and the pursuit close: an Indian rose up just before them. Leroux accosted him in Spanish, calling him amigo, (friend.) The Indian stood and looked as if bewildered and in doubt. At the same moment a chief, well known to Leroux—his name Chacone—appeared off on the right. To run down upon the camp with the Mexicans and rescue the captive before she could be killed, was the instant resolve of Carson and Leroux—a resolve balked and frustrated by the conduct of the dragoons and the commanding officer. Two of the dragoons fired, and alarmed the camp. The commander ordered the Mexicans to halt for the "artillery" to come up, and even to give back to make room for it to fire. It was got up; it was fired; every Indian at that time having left the camp and gone out of sight. Then the party charged—found the camp empty—went through it—and, at a short distance, found the warm, dead body of the unfortunate woman they had come to save, and whose death they had precipitated. She was shot through from side to side with an arrow, and the blood, hot and smoking, (for it was cold weather,) flowed from her wounds. She was dressed as a traveling lady—bonnet, gloves, and cloak, shoes and stockings—and all the usual garments. It was evident that she had been respected and well treated during life, and even her clothes untouched after her fall. Rolled in blankets, and remaining in her bloody dress, she was carried off by the men to receive the most secure and Christian burial which their care and pity could give her.

Years afterwards one of the chiefs told Leroux all the circumstances of this lamentable death. He said they never meant to hurt the woman, and had treated her kindly, giving her a lodge of her own, and saving her own provisions—those taken from the traveling carriage—her tea, sugar, biscuit—all for herself; and were about to send to a settlement for more, as they knew she could not eat their victuals; that she could have been rescued easily if the pursuers had ran into the camp instead of stopping and firing a cannon, as they did; that there were but thirty-five Indians, and they were surprised, and would have run right off, leaving all behind; but when they found they had time, they gathered up their plunder, taking the lady with them; that after starting, she heard the voices of her countrymen, stopped, and turned round, and was shot by a bad Indian before any one saw him. The unfortunate woman was then only two hundred yards from her intended deliverers, and fell a victim to the folly of pot-house soldiers and school-house officers, whose previous folly and criminality had been the cause of her first misfortune. If Carson had been in command she would have been saved; but when he was nominated a lieutenant by President Polk, the Senate rejected him, because he had not approached the army through the West Point gate.

This, Mr. Chairman, was the origin of this Jicarilla Apache war, very bad on our side, and going on at the same rate ever since. It would be tedious, even if there was time in these hurried moments of a night before the last day of this session, to follow the events of the five years and a half of this war, from 1849 down to the present time. One instance must stand for a sample of the whole, and will be produced accordingly for that purpose. It is the case of Lieutenant Davidson's command, almost all killed up, both men and horses, at Cienguilla, twenty miles from Taos, March 30, 1854. The circumstances were these: A band of these Apaches, tired of a war which interrupted their trade, and in which they had taken vengeance enough, approached Taos to make a peace. When at forty miles distance, the head chief dispatched two of his sons and a sub-chief to the commanding officer at Fort Burgwin—not Lieutenant Davidson—to make known his approach and his wishes, and to bring him back an answer for the government of his conduct. The commander of the fort had them all three arrested and put in the guard house. The two young men escaped, and a sergeant's command was sent in pursuit of them, with orders to bring them back. At the same time the head chief, with his band, continued approaching, and at twenty miles distance, not seeing his three messengers return, but confident of a peaceable reception, dispatched a second embassy, more impressively composed than the first. It consisted of an aged man, and an aged woman, the latter a Christian convert, and bearing the crucifix before her as the symbol of peace and good will. These two aged messengers had got within five miles of Taos, when they were met by the sergeant and his party who had gone out to recapture the two young men. The two old messengers were fired upon, and both killed—the aged squaw holding up the sacred emblem of our religion, which she thought would protect her. That done, Lieutenant Davidson, a clever young man, who deserved a better mission, was dispatched with sixty dragoons to whip the advancing party. Enraged at the treatment their messengers of peace had received, the Indians fought with savage fury, making no difference between men and horses, and killing all they could catch. It was a butchery from which a few escaped by flight.

I have these particulars, not like those of the origin of the war, from eye and ear witnesses, but from people of the country who heard, both from citizens and military, all that I relate, and believed it, and referred me for inquiry (if I chose to make it) to an officer of the medical staff, present at the massacre, and wounded in it; and now in the neighborhood of this city: it was the Army surgeon, Dr. Magruder, long stationed in New Mexico, and now on a visit to his friends in Maryland. I have made no inquiries of him, but refer to him, that others may, if they please I would do nothing to compromise him; on the contrary would give it as my opinion that if he wants smiles at the other end of the avenue, he had better be cautious how he states anything to impinge upon the infallibility of a West Point graduate.

Enough for the Jicarilla Apache war: let us come to the second great war, and the one which principally makes this call upon us for this large increase of the regular army—though I believe Cuba and promotion are the real objects. I speak of the Sioux, the numerous bands of which have been so friendly to us for fifty years—just fifty—from the time that Lewis and Clark first met them in 1804, on their way to the Pacific ocean, down to the year 1854. Here we are not quite so deficient of knowledge upon the origin of this Sioux war as upon that of the Jicarilla Apaches. There is one upon this floor who happens to know all about it, and has been striving to get a chance to tell what he knows. I speak of the Delegate from Kansas, [Mr. WHITFIELD,] late Indian agent in that quarter; and as good as present at the origin of this war. We have besides the cotemporaneous accounts of many eye witnesses, written at the moment without knowledge of each other's report, and published in numerous and various newspapers; and still further, we have the official reports of many army officers, some laboring hard to throw the blame upon the Indians, others frankly falling in with the current of the citizens' reports, which throw the whole censure upon our own officers. Let facts decide the case.

Some thousands of Sioux Indians are at Fort Laramie, assembled by the United States agents to receive the periodical annuity secured to them by treaty. They are waiting for the last of the agents to arrive, and to make the distribution. The United States have a garrison at the fort, and two officers in command. In the meanwhile an emigrant Mormon family pass along. There is a lame cow belonging to their herd which falls behind, and a Morman remains in the rear to bring her up. After passing all the Indian camps the cow turns back; her driver keeps on, and an Indian kills the cow, and she is eaten. The Mormon goes to the fort and complains; the commanding officer takes cognizance of the matter, and orders the cow-killer to be brought before him. He refuses to come, and says he will be killed first. The chief, Martoh-i-owa, the Logan of the West, runs backwards and forwards to compose the matter; sometimes exhorting the Indian to surrender; sometimes offering double, treble, quadruple compensation—all to no purpose. Lieutenant Grattan, under discretionary orders from his superior, proceeds to the Indian camps to take the man, dead or alive; and prepared for a fight with the whole camp. He advances into their midst, loads in the face of the Indians, and gives the order to kill all that were not white, when he should give the word to fire; and to make sure of obedience to that word he stood to the twelve pounder himself. The word was given; the friendly chief Martoh-i-owa was killed with three bullets, his brother wounded—no other Indian hurt—and the whole military party instantly massacred. These are the facts of the case, and the concurrent circumstances show the catastrophe to have been the exclusive result of folly and wantonness on the part of the Government officer filled with military ideas got from books, and wholly ignorant of the duties of his position.

In the first place, a criminal offence is made of an act which is no crime by Indian law, or the law of common sense. If a lost animal is found in Indian country, by white man or Indian, he takes it and uses it—making compensation to the owner of the animal if he ever appears. Horses are kept and used; cattle are killed and eaten; and this is the uniform law, and here is an evidence of it in Lieutenant Abert's expedition on the Upper Arkansas, in 1845, Major Fitzpatrick, who recognized it, being one of the safest agents of the West, and a cherished comrade of Frémont. The journal of Lieutenant Abert says:

"We met a party of Apache Indians at this place. The women and children were in the train with the mules and dogs; some were riding in their fashionable gigs, which are formed of the lodge-poles, the largest extremities of which are allowed to trail on the ground; the other ends, crossed on the mules' or dogs' back, form shafts, upon which a basket is affixed to contain the women, children, and chattels. The men, on their prancing steeds, were dashing about in search of fruit and game. One of them stopped to make a confession, which certainly does credit to Indian honesty. He said, 'that for the last few days they had been searching for game, but could not find any; that his squaws and children were crying for meat, and he had not a morsel to give them; the extremity of their sufferings had that morning urged him to kill an ox which he met on the road; and he wished us to intercede with the people at the fort. Urgent necessity had obliged him to do wrong; but he intended to pay for it, and should retain the tail, which he showed us, as a remembrance of his indebtedness.' Mr. Fitzpatrick told him he had done perfectly right; that the white people would not be angry if, when forced by hunger, they should commit such an act, provided they came boldly forth and acknowledged it, and offered remuneration."

This is the law of the whole Indian country, where lost animals go to the wolves, if not saved by some human finder. No crime at all to take such an animal, only a case for compensation; and this is what every Indian knew, and what, in this case, was offered to be done. But, no! West Point discipline must make it a criminal offence, to be militarily punished inside of a garrison; and that was an outrage, and a disgrace to which the killer of the Mormon lame cow would not submit. He would die first! and so declared; and desired the other Indians to quit his lodge, and let him fight it out alone with the soldiers. Lieutenant Grattan went professedly to take this man—in reality to have a fight, prepared for it, with thirty men and two cannon. The Indians made no opposition to his capture. The man himself only refused to surrender. The lieutenant was told to take him, and shown where he was. Instead of going to him, he fired upon an innocent crowd—a la mode de Greytown: and that is what he came to do. Lieutenant Colonel Hoffman, in his official report, says:

"There is no doubt that Lieutenant Grattan left this post with a desire to have a fight with the Indians, and that he had determined to take the man at all hazards. On reaching Mr. Bordeau's trading-house, which was just within the camp, he had an interview with The Bear; and finding that he could not, or would not, give up the man, he moved his command into the camp, and placed his cannon and his infantry in line fronting the lodge occupied by the offender. Here he held a council with the chiefs, which, resulting unsatisfactorily, he appears to have ordered his men to fire. After the first discharge of their muskets, the soldiers were quite at the mercy of the Indians, and they were all massacred."

Adjutant General Cooper, remarking upon this report, says, "there is nothing in the accompanying papers to corroborate the statement of Lieutenant Colonel Hoffman, 'that Lieutenant Grattan left his post with a desire to have a fight with the Indians.'" This is a mistake of the Adjutant General. Every circumstance of the case, and positive testimony besides, proves that the lieutenant went to fight the Indians, and did commence the fight upon them, not attempting to take the cow-killer, who was in his lodge alone, sixty yards distant, in full view of the soldiery, and waiting for them to come on. All the reports agree that the lieutenant's orders to his men were to kill everything that was not white when he gave the orders to fire. Why this firing at the lump if a general fight was not intended? Why fire with grape-shot and musketry upon an innocent and unsuspecting multitude, and that, too, on an annuity ground, but little less sacred than a treaty ground? Why not stop his interpreter if he did not wish him to bring on a fight? The fellow was drunk, and inflaming the Indians with taunts and insults. Part of his talk was, that "the lieutenant was coming with thirty men, and cannon, and that this time he would eat their hearts raw." The interpreter was his mouth piece—spoke in the name of the lieutenant, and threatened death and destruction. Bordeau begged the lieutenant to put the fellow in his house, promising to settle the difficulty in thirty minutes if he was put away. No attention was paid to this request. Everybody cried out against the interpreter, and that he would bring on a fight. The only effect on the lieutenant was to make him take away the remainder of the fellow's whisky—which was an absurd remedy, he being as drunk already as liquor could make him. Why let this fellow go on thus, unless he was promoting the lieutenant's design? which, in fact, he was. Those who would excuse Lieutenant Grattan throw the blame on the interpreter; but that is nonsense; for the interpreter was his own mouth-piece, spoke for him, in his name, and he refused to stop him by putting him into Bordeau's house. But there is positive proof. Mr. Olbridge Allen, a traveler just arrived from California, says:

"I arrived at this post the day before the massacre of Lieutenant Grattan and his command. On the day of the massacre I accompanied the party to Mr. Bordeau's trading-house. We stopped a few minutes at Mr. Gratiot's, eight or nine miles below this post, where, fearing there might be some trouble with the Indians, I left my overcoat. While here, Lieutenant Grattan ordered his men to load, and just below the house he gave them his orders, telling them to obey only his orders, or those of the sergeant; said he, 'When I give the order, you may fire as much as you d—d please.' He told them he didn't believe a gun would be fired, but he 'hoped to God they would have a fight.'"

Yes! "hoped to God they would have a fight;" and he took care to make one, in the full confidence that he was to have an easy victory. A few days before he said, in the presence of white people, that he wanted a "muss" with the Indians. They were perfectly quiet until the soldiers and cannon appeared. Then uneasiness began among them, some running backwards and forwards to make peace; but the greater part getting ready for action. The whole affair was unexpected by the Indians, as shown by their conduct; and so attests many witnesses. Lieutenant Colonel Hoffman, says:

"It does not seem that the affair was anticipated by the Indians, but they evidently prepared themselves for it as soon as they knew what the troops came for."

Mr. Bordeau says:

"There was no excitement before the soldiers arrived, and when they came in sight the Indians expressed their surprise and wondered who they were. No one at my house knew anything of the difficulty, and had heard nothing of the soldiers coming."

It was a military movement, secretly planned, quietly executed to the decisive moment, and evidently intended to be accomplished by surprise.

The plainest, simplest, most brief, and evidently faithful account of the affair was given responsibly by Mr. Bordeau, the trader, and a man of the greatest respectability, to Major Winship; and by him communicated to the War Department, and found at page twelve in the document from which we have quoted. It is dated at Fort Laramie, September 2, and says:

"SIR: I have not the honor of your acquaintance; but, from the situation of the country at the present time, I take the liberty of writing to you to inform you of facts as near as possible concerning the fight between the United States troops and the Sioux Indians on the 19th of last month; I having been an eye-witness to the battle, and having heard the true causes, I think, of its having occurred. On the 17th of last month there was a train of Mormon emigrants passed the village of the Brulés, Wazzazies, and Ogalalla bands of Sioux Indians, which were camped on the Platte river, six miles, more or less, below Fort Laramie; and after the train had got pretty well past the village, there was a man behind the train driving a lame cow, and by some means or other the cow got frightened, and ran towards the village. The man, in turn, having some fears, and not knowing that the Indians would not harm him, left the cow, and an Indian, a stranger, from another band of the Sioux, called the Minne-Cousha, killed the cow, and they ate it; and accordingly the emigrants, as they passed the fort, reported the affair, and on the 19th, Lieutenant Grattan, with a command of twenty-nine soldiers, with the interpreter, came to the village to make the arrest of the Indian who killed the cow. The Lieutenant came to me to learn the best way to get the offender, and I told him that it was better to get the chief to try to get the offender to give himself up by his own good will; but he was not willing. The offender requested of the Indians to let him do as he pleased, for he wanted to die, and that the balance of the Indians would not have anything to do with the affair; and then the lieutenant asked of me to go in the village with him, and I started to go, when another express came and said that the offender would not give himself up; and then the lieutenant asked me to show him the lodge that the offender was in, and I did so. He then marched with his men into the village, within about sixty yards of said lodge, and then fired upon the Indians. The first fire was made by the soldiers, and there was one Indian wounded; and then the chiefs harangued to the young men not to charge on the soldiers; that, being that they, the soldiers, had wounded one Indian, they possibly would be satisfied; but the lieutenant ordered his men to fire their cannon and muskets, and accordingly the chiefs that had went with the soldiers to help to make the arrest, ran, and in the fire they wounded the Bear, chief of the Wazzazies; and as soon as the soldiers' fire was over, the Indians, in turn, rushed and killed the lieutenant and five men by their cannon, and the balance of the men took to flight, and were all killed in one mile or so from the cannon."

This account bears internal evidence of truth, and is, besides, corroborated by the uniform current of the whole disinterested testimony. How impressive this simple narrative, and fatal to the lieutenant's defence, that killing conclusion—marched with his men into the village, within about sixty yards of said lodge, and then fired upon the Indians!—not upon the cow killer, in his lodge, (and that would have been unjustifiable,) but on the innocent crowd; and that was murder.

I deny the right to have killed the Mini-Cousha. Where did this new doctrine come from, and when did it arise, that United States officers may order Indians off, and shoot them if they don't go? Or order them into forts, and shoot them if they don't go in? When, and whence the origin of these crimes and follies, so dreadfully acted upon at the Moro and at Fort Laramie, with such bloody consequences to the people and the country? Whence these novelties? They come from military fledglings, puffed up with consequence, stuffed with book learning, ignorant of everything they ought to know—acting the great Mogul upon a small scale—sending out sergeants to give absurd orders to those over whom they have no authority, and to kill if they are not obeyed. The killing of the Mini-Coujah, under such circumstances, would have been the murder of one man: firing on the innocent crowd, many of whom were laboring for peace, was wholesale and foul murder.

The official reports of some of the officers of this criminal business are severely reprehensible, being erroneous in facts and revolting in principle. Of both these delinquencies Lieutenant Fleming's report presents eminent instances. Of the cow killing, he gives this account:

"On the 18th of August one of the Sioux went to an emigrant train passing along the road, and tried to kill one of them, but, failing in this, shot down one of the cattle in the train, which left the poor emigrant in a very destitute condition."

This sentence is contradicted by the entire body of evidence. It contains nearly as many errors of fact as there are words, and all intended to make out a black case against the cow-killer. It represents him as trying to kill a Mormon, and failing in that, killed an ox in his place, to the great destitution of the poor Mormon. The murder of the peace-maker chief, Martoh-i-owa, he considers a warlike exploit, and enumerates among the honors of the day, thus:

"I have no reliable information as to the number of Indians killed and wounded: 'The Bear,' (Martoh-i-owa,) head chief, is reported among the killed."

Then comes a sage recommendation as to the means of the military protecting themselves—"the only effectual means of protecting ourselves!"—and the recommendation runs thus:

"I have recommended that all traders in the country be prohibited from trading guns or ammunition on any pretense whatever, and the Indian agent, General Whitfield, has accordingly prohibited this kind of trade with the Indians till further orders. This I consider, with all who have any knowledge of the dangerous state of the country, as a commendable stroke of policy in General Whitfield. In fact, I might add, at present this is the only effectual means we have of protecting ourselves."

Two follies shine preëminent in this recommendation; first, depriving the Indians of the means of subsistence, and breaking up all our trade with them; second, throwing them into the hands of the British traders to purchase guns and ammunition, and to carry on trade—the first folly being inhuman, the second silly; and yet this is the "only effectual way of protecting ourselves." No way to save our soldiers but to deprive the Indians of guns and ammunition! After this, I think it is full time to send back these graduates to West Point, to become schoolmasters themselves.

Captain brevet lieutenant colonel Steptoe is not much better. He volunteers a report from Great Salt Lake City, not dated in the Government house, in which the cow-killer is made to fire "first." He says:

"The chief of the Brulés, among whom the offender was staying, went with Mr. Grattan to the man, and he refused to go, saying 'he had two guns and plenty of arrows, and could fight.' About the time that Grattan regained his command this Indian fired. G. then ordered his musketry to fire."

The untruth of this needs no contradiction. But, not satisfied with making the man fire "first" who never fired at all—who was waiting calmly in his solitary lodge for the lieutenant, his twenty-nine men and two cannon, to come and kill him, nobly determining to be killed sooner than led prisoner into a garrison, and generously keeping off others that none should share his fate; not satisfied with making this victim an aggressor, he makes the whole affair, in his opinion, a deliberate plan of attack by the Indians upon the garrison. Thus:

"This statement shows that Lieutenant Grattan did not take the initiative, and it goes to confirm my opinion that the attack upon the troops was part of a deliberate plan. Why the attack was not followed by one upon the fort I do not know."

"I do not know," says this Governor in abeyance: nor does any one know—no such attack on the fort being dreamed of. Fortunately, the Lord does not seem to have yet told Brigham to give up the governorship: and Brigham won't till he does, and that will probably be some time first: so this defender of the Fort Laramie murders may have, for a while, a smaller theater for the exercise of the talent which would defend such crime—and defend it with untruth.

The call for more troops and more provisions was earnest and lamentable, and would indicate a most unnecessary degree of alarm. Thus, Lieutenant Fleming to his superiors the day after the massacre, says:

"The Indians are hostile, menacing the fort; but all my men are on duty, and I think we shall be able to keep possession of it.

"We stand much in need of more troops, and hope they will be sent as soon as possible. I have sent this by express to the commanding officer of Fort Leavenworth, and requested him to telegraph the same to you without delay.

"Provision must accompany the troops, as we have only sufficient for those now at the post."

The fact is, the Indians were astonished and bewildered. Some joined in the massacre: others tried to prevent it; and after it was over endeavored to save some wounded. Mr. Allen, certified by Colonel Hoffman to have given the most reliable and consistent account of the massacre, the whole of which he watched, and looked for from the conduct and language of Lieutenant Grattan, and his mouth-piece, the drunk interpreter, gives a touching account of one instance of this which he saw at Bordeau's house. He says:

"An Indian then came into the house with a wounded soldier, about twenty other Indians being present; some friendly and some not. This Indian told those around him, 'If you kill this soldier, you kill me, for I shall die with him.' The hostiles then warned Bordeau, that he had better not keep the soldier in the house, else they would 'wipe out the whites,' and they further told him to advise the soldier to conceal himself in the bushes. Then Bordeau asked the soldier if he was able to walk to the fort; and being told by him that he thought he was, Mr. B. directed the Indian who had brought him in, to take him to the road and start him off in the direction of the fort. The Indian took him on the road about a mile and a half towards the garrison."

At the same time that our officers were in this trepidation, fearing for their fort, dreading a universal Indian war, believing in ambuscades, and calling for more troops and provisions, there were two French gentlemen at the fort, offering to go alone, with a servant, and ascertain the true state of things among the Sioux, and report the result—one, Mr. Paul Carrey, a French traveler, to me well known; and deserving the commendation bestowed upon him; the other, a French gentleman, of St. Louis, Mr. Sarpy. Their offer is thus officially reported by the commanding general of the Department, Brevet Brigadier General Clark:

"In addition to the major's report and the accompanying statements, I forward an extract of a journal kept by Mr. Carrey, a respectable French gentleman, kindly offered by him. Mr. Carrey is intelligent and adventurous, fond of and addicted to expeditions upon the plains. He would, I have reason to believe, return to the region of the Sioux, if furnished, at the expense of the Government, with a guide, animals, and servant, offering to collect there information as to the numbers, condition, locale, and haunts of the Sioux, and the features of the country. He would go if it be thought proper to send him under the auspices of a Mr. Sarpy, a St. Louis creole, having trading establishments in the region of country the usual roam of that people. I believe the gentleman can be relied upon, and would procure useful information."

And I have no doubt but that if these two gentlemen, or many other two out of thousands in the West, were sent among all the hostile tribes without a soldier, and with authority to hear their real complaints and do justice, peace would be restored. But these regulars—such as we have in these times—can do no good, but harm. They bring on wars; they cause cruel retaliations on travelers and settlers, themselves safe in garrisons. Their posts are no protection; they are the most dangerous places to pass, the Indians lying about them to catch the soldiers when they come out. The mail party from the Great Salt Lake was massacred last November in sight of Fort Laramie, and in further revenge for the attack of the 19th of August. Dragoons, such as we now have, are a burlesque on the name, and the sport of Indians. The man cannot ride. The horse, bred to corn, cannot go out without a bag full on his back; and when it gives out, has to turn back because he has none in his belly. The keep of a horse at some of these posts is about equal to the board of a member of Congress—leaving out the wine—at a first-class hotel in this city. He is stabled and groomed as at West Point, fed on provender brought from afar, and costing heavily by the time it is delivered. At the same time the country abounds with grass; and grass-fed horses, which the Indians use, costing nothing for their keep, and able to go half speed down precipices where one of our stable-bred dragoon animals could hardly be led down, or his rider either. Frémont said—and put it in his journal—that the abundance of grass in the far West was to change the mode of carrying on war there—to make it like Cossack or Tartar—every soldier on a horse, which would feed himself, and rapidly carry his rider to the place of action. But Frémont was not educated at West Point, and his opinions are despised by a West Point Administration. General Dodge marched his mounted rangers sixteen hundred miles at one time, without public provender; Colonel Doniphan marched his mounted regiment six thousand miles, by New Mexico and Chihuahua, in the same way; while the horses of the regular Army, in old Mexico, were fed upon corn from Kentucky, oats from Pennsylvania, and hay from Massachusetts—all measured and weighed to them with military precision, and according to the rules; and to the depletion of our Treasury in proportion to the repletion of their stomachs. God defend the West from these four new regular regiments! If we must have them, rather let them follow their true destination—furnish promotions, and wait for the chance to go to Cuba.

The exploits of the day—black day, 19th of August, 1854—may be summed up thus:

On the part of the Indians, one man killed, and one wounded—Martoh-i-owa, the slain, his brother the wounded. Of this slain chief, the Logan of the West, a writer in a St. Louis paper, who knew him well, thus speaks:

"We knew him well, and a better friend the white man never had. He was brave, and gentle, and kind—a wise ruler, a skillful warrior, and respected chieftain. Even in accepting his position, assigned to him some four years ago at the treaty of Laramie, he only consented after much persuasion; and then remarked when he did so, that he 'gave his life to the Great Spirit.' So far from any charge of treachery attaching to his conduct, his own fate is a sufficient proof of his fidelity; in recording it, we feel like inscribing a worthy memorial of one of the most high-toned and chivalric of all the Indians whom we have known."

He was killed in the first discharge of musketry, almost in company with the soldiers—struck with three balls, one breaking an arm, one shattering a knee, one going through the body. Dying, he begged his people not to avenge his death upon the innocent emigrants, but only on the soldiers; which they promised to do, if they could catch them out of their garrison. His brother, wounded, was standing by him, also struck by musketry. The formidable cannon did no other damage than to make a hole in the top of a lodge, at double the height of a man. These were all the trophies on the part of the United States. On the part of the Indians their trophies are: one officer, twenty-nine men, and one interpreter, killed; none wounded; two cannon and their equipments captured; twelve mules and harness; the lieutenant's horse; ordnance stores; one wagon; $50,000 worth of goods taken—the public farm ravaged—and the cattle killed—Bordeau's trading house plundered—for which he is entitled to compensation from the United States: other traders plundered. These were the immediate trophies to the Indians, together with the honor of keeping the field. The consequential were, the breaking up the settlements about Fort Laramie, the breaking up of travel and immigration on that route; the murder of the mail party within seven miles of the fort, with pillage of the mail and robbery of $10,000; the doubling of the compensation for carrying the mail, by act of this session; this demand for four more new regiments, of the same kind which have done all the mischief, $2,500,000 to raise them; and the promise of a universal Indian war. These are the fruits of that day's work! The balance tremendously against us in the materiel, lost and gained; and equally against us on the score of honor lost or gained. A heavy penalty for a nation to pay for a lame runaway Mormon cow, and for the folly and juvenile ambition of a West Point fledgling.

I object to any more regular troops. Our regiments now lack three thousand five hundred men to fill their ranks. We can officer the four new regiments, but we cannot fill the ranks of those we have; but perhaps it will answer all the purposes if we create one hundred and fifty new officers, although we have about that number (naval included,) now employed in civil duties; and are pushing the old ones off to make room for the young ones. Oh! that reserved list! An inquisitorial board to sit, and bow-string old fogies. All that are unfit for service—morally, mentally, or bodily—to be put on a "reserved" list—to become a "reserve" to be called out when the genius of the Secretary at War shall direct! Like those superb corps which at Austerlitz, Jena, Friedland, stood back till the decisive moment came, then charged, and decided the fate of battles and empires. All that will be wanting to complete the similitude will be for our Secretary to charge himself at the head of this redoubtable reserve when he calls them into action to turn the tide of battles, "big with the fate of Cæsar and of Rome." In the mean time we have gained a great legislative victory: we have established those civil pensions under the name of a "reserved," which could not be got under the name of a "retired" list: and we have found a new method of gaining places for our annual brood of officers by reversing the rule of fishes, and make the young ones devour the old ones. It was necessary. The supply was too great for the demand. Two hundred and fifty young officers continually on the stocks, and coming off by annual deliveries, were more than could find commissions in the present army, even with the (almost) one hundred and fifty engaged in civil duties. This "reserved" list, and these four regiments, are necessary to provide for this annual and perennial manufacture of officers. The same of the Navy. There, also, two hundred and fifty baby officers constantly on the stocks, and no way to provide for them except in building new ships, to rot like the old ones; and "reserving" the old officers to make room for the young ones. Five hundred officers on the stocks at a time! army and navy. Truly, we shall soon be able to rival those army and navy and pension lists of Great Britain, which have loaded England with debt, buried her in taxes, filled her with paupers, and sent the laborer supperless to bed. Five hundred baby officers constantly on the stocks, and all to be provided for as soon as on their legs—and pensioned when not salaried. What is to become of our poor United States? What would become of any good man who should have a dozen babies on the stocks at a time—and all the time? The poor fellow would be bankrupt buying baby clothes and cradles—paying for nursing and washing. And so it will be with these poor United States, and their five hundred embryo officers constantly coming forth for ships and troops, salaries and pensions, and leaving widows and children to be provided for.

Our President recommends an increase of ships: they are certainly not for the prairies of the West! and "Cuba" lies inscribed on all their bottoms. Our Secretaries second the demand, and tell us to take a glance at Europe. So I will, and tell them what I see—tell them that navy which has been building since the time of Peter the Great, was useless the first day it was wanted, and worse! required armies the greatest, and forts the strongest in the world, to protect it. Ninety thousand troops on the Baltic, of which forty thousand are in Cronstadt; some hundred thousand on the Black sea—the forts protecting the ships, and the troops protecting the forts. Even in Kamschatka, at the little place of Petropaulowsky, a fort and troops have to save two Russian frigates. What a commentary upon the folly of undertaking to build a navy to contend with the navies of the world. We want cruisers, not ships of the line and fleets; and all we expend in that view, is worse than thrown into the sea; for after being built, it will require ten times as much to keep them afloat until they rot: and that is what I see by taking a "glance at Europe."

But to return to the Fort Laramie massacre. It was murder! as much so as if those twenty-nine muskets and two cannon had been fired through this Hall, here among ourselves, sitting in our seats, and killing whom it might. But Lieutenant Grattan is not the only one to blame. Though dreadfully culpable, he is not the only one guilty. His immediate commander was the prime cause of his conduct, in giving him "discretionary" orders, knowing his violent intentions; and in making a criminal offence, to be militarily punished, of what was only a debt, to be requited with money or property. He was culpable, again, in justifying the murder, making out a one-sided report, throwing all the blame upon the Indians, and calling upon the Government to pursue them with war and vengeance. All the officers who justified the act (and there are several of them) are severely censurable, and show themselves to be unfit to be trusted with command in an Indian country. The Administration is culpable which has not rebuked this great misdeed; but that is not to be expected from an Administration militarily imbued, and ready to sustain any regular officer in all his acts; and to repulse those who would impugn any part of his conduct.

But to return to regulars as a fit force to fight Indians. They are not fit—such men as we now enlist—for any such service. They know nothing about Indians, and have no interest in preserving peace. They can go into their garrisons when they have blundered into blood, and let retaliation fall upon the traveler and the settler. They have no heart to their profession, because they have no promotion: no promotion! the act of Congress to that effect being nullified by a set of regulations under which General Jackson never saw the day that he could get a lieutenant's commission. Pay is their only incentive, and that reduces the soldier to a mercenary. Having no promotion, respectable young men will not enlist; the pot-house and the city purlieus become the resource for recruits; and, whether it is natives or foreigners who are caught in such places, it is all the same. No public spirit, no patriotism, no inducement to merit reward; for none is to be attained. Men, ignorant of Indians, and too old to learn; men, ignorant of horses, and too old to learn, either to ride on a horse or to take care of him: such is our present supply for the regular army; and the result is seen in our Indian wars—in dreadful misconduct towards the Indians—in wholesale desertions—in the loss and destruction of horses, arms, and equipments—in enormous and incredible expense of the army, now averaging above $1,000 a year for every man employed; and increasing continually. Two more regiments of cavalry—having two already—to be commanded by officers who learn to ride in a house, and rode by men who never learned to ride either inside or outside of a house—who roll off like pumpkins, if the horse goes a little fast, the man falling one side, and the gun the other; and who are as unfit to take care of a horse as a Comanche Indian would be to run a spinning-jenny. What have our army horses cost us since the war? how much to buy them? how much to feed them? how much for their equipments? and what losses by negligence, ignorance, and mismanagement—by Indian thefts, and by deserting soldiers? Can anybody tell? I presume not. Does any one care? It would seem not; for we vote all that is demanded, without asking a question; and demands are made as if money was water. I see $200,000 for more horses in the army bill—for the old regiments—besides the $2,500,000 for the new ones. It would make an astounding document to see the cost and waste of horses, mules, and oxen, since the war with Mexico, including the Mexican boundary commissions and the scientific explorations, in one of which alone—that of Governor Stevens—I have been informed, four hundred head were employed and destroyed. The War Office gives us no information on these points; and Congress grants what is asked without inquiry. Will the people wake up, and wake up before we arrive at the present debt and tax condition of Great Britain?—a condition to which we are now traveling with more headlong haste than ever the British did. It is a long time since I have heard the word "economy." That is an obsolete word in our present democratic vocabulary. No, Mr. Chairman, these regulars are not fit for Indian war; and the more of them we raise the better for the Indians, and the worse for ourselves. The Indians will get more plunder, and we shall pay more money; and at last the Indian wars will have to be ended as others have been, by citizen rangers and volunteers; and as the Florida war was, by the armed occupation policy.

I have limited myself to two cases only of present Indian wars in my own quarter of the Union brought on us by military misconduct. General Houston in the Senate has given in a catalogue of others in his quarter. I could extend my number, but forbear. One case only I will mention, because it is brief, characteristic, little known, and admits of no "proving and 'fending." We call it the war of the "Burnt Wagons." The circumstances are these: Twenty-nine wagons, in the fall of 1850, transporting Government stores from Fort Leavenworth to Santa Fé, were stopped by a fall of snow on the Arkansas river. While waiting, some of the teamsters, or attendants, went to the military post on that river, some twenty miles lower down. They were met by some Pawnees, who asked for provisions; and not receiving them, helped themselves; and departed without doing further damage. This is considered a slight matter by Indians—an excusable liberty—as hospitality is their first law, and they give of what they have without asking, and without price, to the stranger who enters their tent. Every Indian can make the speech of Logan in that particular. Arriving at the post, the men reported the case to the commandant. He sent out his dragoons—with what orders I know not—but with what effect is well known. They killed three of the Indians, reporting that they fired first—an absurd lie, contradicted by the conduct of the Indians who had had the teamsters in their hands when they took the provisions, and did not hurt a hair of their heads. Of course these dragoons would be safe in their garrison from the retaliation they had provoked. Not so of persons and property on the road. The first revenge fell upon the twenty-nine wagons stopped on the bank of the Arkansas. Waiting for a high March wind, blowing a gale in the right direction, they set fire to the tall dry grass; and in two minutes from the time it was first seen, two miles off, the wagons were wrapped in a sheet of flame, and burned merrily from their contents—chiefly bacon and clothing—the men in charge of them saving their lives by jumping into the river, and swimming down it: for the flames spanned the stream, and the burning wood and grass, meat and cloth, rained fire upon the water, scorching those who could not dive. The river ran cinders, smoke, and ashes, and the smell of broiled bacon for twenty miles down; that is to say, down to the post—where the garrison could not drink the water for twenty-four hours. The loss to the contractors was the twenty-nine wagons and their harness; to the Government all the contents of the wagons, namely, seventy-six tons weight of bacon, flour, and clothing. After that came the usual quantity of bloodshed on the Santa Fé road.

Let this stand for a sample: there is no time for full histories. Skirmishes, called "battles," have been going on in New Mexico ever since the peace, variegated with plunder of the people, killing, wounding, burning, and carrying off stock, and retail and wholesale desertions; in one instance of which forty dragoons deserted at once, with all their horses and equipments, and every Colt's revolver that was in the garrison. I want no more of such troops.

I prefer the committee's plan of volunteers to the regulars recommended by the Administration; but I prefer my own plan of mounted rangers and block-house settlements to either. I have spoken to the defects of the Administration plan. I will now introduce my own, and speak to its advantages. It has been printed for the use of the members, and the clerk will read it for the information of all.

The Clerk read:

Strike out all, and insert:

That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized to raise by acceptance of companies, or enlistment for three years, unless sooner discharged, eight battalions of mounted rangers, to be armed, equipped, mounted, and organized in such manner, and to be under such regulations and restrictions, as the nature of the service may, in his opinion, make necessary; and which shall range continually without fixed camps.

Sec. —. And be it further enacted, That each of said companies of rangers shall consist of one captain, one first, and one second lieutenant, to be elected by the company, and commissioned by the President of the United States; three sergeants, three corporals, one bugler, and sixty-four privates; and four companies shall compose a battalion.

Sec. —. And be it further enacted, That one lieutenant colonel, and one major, be appointed for each battalion to be raised, to be appointed by the President and Senate of the United States; and all the commissioned officers in said battalion shall receive a monthly compensation equal to the monthly pay, rations, and allowances of officers of equal grade in the cavalry service of the United States, with a commutation of twenty-five cents per diem for forage for horses; and the non-commissioned officers, buglers, and privates, shall receive a monthly compensation equal to the pay, rations, and clothing, of like non-commissioned officers, buglers, and privates in the cavalry service, with a commutation of twenty-five cents per diem, for foraging their own horses. And all the men and officers of said battalions shall find their own horses and equipments, and their own arms and provisions, and forage for their horses, and ammunition, except when convenient to draw such ammunition from some military post or arsenal; and all rations commuted under this act shall be rated at twenty-five cents each; and each and every man and officer of said battalions, shall be entitled to one half section of land, to be taken in the Territory or State in which he serves, and all alienations of the same to be void before the patent therefor issues; and said named compensation and land shall be in full of all claims for compensation for services, damages, and losses of every kind sustained by them in the discharge of their duties. And the said lieutenant colonels and majors shall have instructions from the President of the United States to seek peace by conciliatory means as well as by force, and especially to learn the causes of complaint, and what is necessary to restore peace.

Sec. —. And be it further enacted, That said battalions shall be employed jointly and separately, or by companies, as the President may direct, and in such parts of the United States and their Territories as the defense of the people from Indian depredation and hostilities may require.

Sec. —. And be it further enacted, That said battalions be raised for three years, subject to be discharged, in whole or in part, at any time sooner that the President may direct.

Sec. —. And be it further enacted, That the provisions of the act entitled "An act to authorize the President to raise mounted volunteers for the defense of the frontier," approved June 15, 1832, so far as the same are applicable, and not inconsistent with the provisions of this act, shall be, and hereby are, revived and enforced in relation to the force herein authorized to be raised; and the sum of $500,000, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, shall be, and the same hereby is, appropriated to carry this act into effect.

Sec. —. And be it further enacted, That the provisions of the act approved August 4, 1842, entitled "An act to provide for the armed occupation and settlement of the unsettled part of the peninsula of Florida," and of the acts in amendment thereof, shall be, and the same are hereby, revived and extended to the western Territories of the United States, to wit: New Mexico, Utah, Oregon, Washington, Nebraska, and Kansas, with the following modifications:

I. The President shall designate the districts within which such settlements shall be made.

II. The settler shall obtain from the register of the nearest land office a permit to settle in such district, and as soon as the settlement is made, shall send to said office a description of the locality thereof.

III. That said settler shall be entitled to one half section of land, to include his improvement, and to conform to sectional and subdivisional lines when surveyed.

IV. The said districts shall comprehend an area equal, at the least, to twenty miles square.

V. Compensation shall be made to the Indians claiming such districts as soon as they become peaceable.

Sec. —. And be it further enacted, That each contractor engaged, or to be engaged, in carrying mails through any of said Territories, shall have the privilege of occupying stations at the rate of not more than one for every twenty miles of the route on which he carries a mail, and shall have a preëmptive right therein, when the same shall be brought into market, to the extent of six hundred and forty acres, to be taken contiguously, and to include his improvement; but no such preëmptive right shall extend to any pass in a mountain, or other defile.

My proposition presents a combined plan of rangers and settlers, either of them good in itself, and perfect when united. Rangers are the primeval troops, the first kind ever raised, when every man was his own quartermaster to provide his own transportation, his own commissary to provide his own food, his own magazine to furnish his arms and ammunition. They are always local to the country they defend, know it, and its enemies—have an interest in it, and feel that they are protecting families and travelers, others as well as their own; and that they return to the bosom of their fellow-citizens, to be rewarded or censured according to their conduct. They are the cheapest, most efficient, and most ready species of force that ever covered the frontiers of a country from a marauding and depredating enemy. They are of early and honorable use in our country. Washington, as major, commanded a battalion of them, covering the frontiers of Virginia when the Blue Ridge was the frontier of that colony. We have had them often since—the last and most noted instance being that of the then colonel, now Senator, Dodge, of Wisconsin. Electing their own company officers, the men and officers feel confidence in each other, and respect for each other. No one is deserted in danger, in want, or in sickness. This is the kind of force I propose to raise—eight battalions of them—one to each Territory, and two over, disposable as wanted: four companies to a battalion, and about seventy men, all told, to a company. Besides a lumping pay which covers all service and expenses, a grant of three hundred and twenty acres of land is added, to give an interest in the country defended, and to meet the contingency of a lost horse. The President is to appoint the two field officers to each battalion, the major and lieutenant colonel—no colonel being necessary, as the battalions are not to act in regiment. These appointments are deferred to the President, to give him a direct control over the general movements of the battalion, and in the expectation that he would take these officers from the part of the country which raised the battalion—from among the citizens who had seen some military service, who know their enemy, his habits and haunts; and who also would have an interest in the country he protected. Thus raised and organized, always in motion, no fixed camps, scouring the country in companies and half companies when no large force required the union of the battalion, they could not fail to be effective. Other advantages over regulars are in the ease and rapidity with which they can be raised, their ready disbandment when no longer needed, and in the difference of expense—my plan only requiring $500,000 for the annual pay, while that of the four regular regiments sets out with requiring just five times the amount for the first year.

The field officers commanding these battalions are to have instructions from the President to use conciliatory means, as well as force, to restore peace with the hostile tribes. They are to inquire into the causes of their complaint, and see if wrong has been done them, and what will satisfy them. My knowledge of Indian character, and the cause of Indian wars, gives me great confidence in the effect of this appeal to them, made by a western man who understands them. I have known of many instances of wars prevented, or stopped by that means, and will mention one. In the fall of 1846 news arrived at Monterey that one thousand Wah-lah-wah-lah Indians were approaching the frontier to attack Suter's fort. General Vallejo called out his whole division; Commodore Stockton assembled all his disposable force, collected transports, and rapidly prepared to go up the bay of San Francisco to meet the formidable enemy. Information of the impending invasion, and of the energetic measures adopted to meet it, were duly forwarded to the Government of the United States; and, in fact, a large military movement was on the point of being made. Fortunately, Colonel Frémont was at that time in the valley of the Sacramento, in the line of the expected invasion, raising his California battalion for the suppression of the Los Angeles insurrection. He had four hundred western riflemen. He might have gone with them to meet the Wah-lah-wah-lahs in the confidence of a certain victory and a great renown. His knowledge of Indian war reports made him incredulous of numbers, and his knowledge of Indians let him know that when they come to attack a frontier it is to avenge some wrong; and that a few words spoken in season, and in the spirit of justice, might put things right. So he took, not four hundred men, but four—Captain Owens and two others—and went to meet the danger. He arrived at the camp; there were—not one thousand—but fifty. One of them had seen him, proclaimed his name, and the Indians flocked about him to tell their complaint and design. One of their tribe, a fine young man, who had been educated at the Methodist mission on the Columbia, had been killed and robbed by a white man at Suter's fort; and they were going in to demand satisfaction; and, if not given, to take it before they left the frontier. Colonel Frémont knew that they spoke the truth; that the murder and robbery had been committed, and promised them redress if they would follow his counsel. He told them he was then going to the South to attend to the California war, and should be gone till spring, and could not attend to their case sooner. In the mean time, he proposed to them to go to a certain part of the country, which he named, and make a winter's hunt, with one of his men, who would carry the United States flag and hold it over them, and that whoever struck that flag struck him; promising to meet them at the same place in the spring, and have justice done them. They became as docile as children under this talk—did as he proposed—and even gave him ten of their young men to go with him—who proved themselves to be among the best in his battalion. Returning in the spring, in company with General Kearny, by whom he had been superseded, and then in a state of actual, but not declared, arrest, he met the Indians waiting for him. He had no power, no means, no right even to use the name of the United States. But he knew it would never do to break faith with Indians; that no explanations could justify a breach of promise; so he made the redress his own affair, and gave them of his own horses until they were satisfied. In that way the first Indian war that was to have been in California was averted; and so quietly that the public never heard of it. In the same way, I believe, every hostile tribe west of the Mississippi might now be approached; that such men as Frémont, Carson, Leroux, Father de Smedt, the Catholic missionary—I name him because Catholics are now struck at—Edward F. Beale, David D. Mitchell, Richard W. Cummins—the three last being removed agents and superintendents—and a long catalogue of other western men, could now go to every hostile tribe west of the Mississippi, and arrange every difficulty with them in the very first interview. But no such men will be employed; no such means will be applied; West Point rules; and war is the word.

Let us go on with the remedy I propose—the rangers and the armed settlers. The use of the rangers I have explained; the armed occupation plan I proceed to develop. It is the same which I got adopted for Florida, which terminated, so quietly that it was not heard of—that Indian war which had baffled our regulars and depleted our Treasury. The plan is in the amendment which I propose, and which will work as well west of the Mississippi as it did on the Gulf of Mexico. Everybody has heard of that Florida war—the length of time it lasted, the tens of millions it cost, the serious damage which it did to our military reputation. All have heard of the war, and its cost in blood, and money, and character: yet no one knows how it ended, or when. No victory crushed it; no treaty stopped it; no proclamation announced its termination. Yet cease it did, and that under the armed occupation act, the principles of which I propose to apply to the disturbed Territories west of the Mississippi. It is the principle on which the Promised Land was conquered and defended by the children of Israel—"an inheritance in the land." The Florida armed occupation act gave a quarter section, as it passed, (three hundred and twenty acres was my proposition,) to every settler who should go into the infested district, beyond the Withlacooche, and remain there five years. Thirteen hundred men went; the war died out under their presence; the finest county grew up, named by the Legislature BENTON, which name a subsequent Legislature changed to HERNANDEZ, when it adopted certain nullification resolutions which I denounced; but the settlers who got homes under my law still call it BENTON county. I propose the extension of that policy to our western Territories, modified to suit localities, three hundred and twenty acres the quantity, five years the required residence, and the President to lay off the districts, each equal to twenty miles square, on which the armed settlement is to be made. This plan would settle the country as well as protect and defend it. Combined with the ranging force, it would immediately give peace and tranquillity to all our vast western Territories, and to all the traveling routes between the Mississippi and the Pacific.

It is an unenviable task to say anything in favor of Indians, but my experience and observation authorize me to say that they seldom shed blood except for revenge; and that almost all our Indian wars (leaving out those formerly incited by foreigners) arose from some outrage first committed upon them by whites. They have a feeling, formerly inexorable, that it takes blood to cover up blood; in later times a commutation is accepted; and in this acceptance of compensation, the door is opened to peaceable conclusions. Hospitality is their strong feeling; and of this the most savage of the tribes now hostile to us have given proofs, even during the hostilities. Frémont and Beale have passed among the Utahs within a year, not only unharmed, but aided—receiving from them food and shelter. Frémont, in the extremity of hunger in his last winter expedition, killed a horse which belonged to a band of Utahs; he went to their camp, avowing what he had done, and they accepted compensation, according to the law of the prairies. They did not think of making it a crime, to be militarily punished, but a debt to be liquidated with some blankets, powder, and lead, and tobacco. Another party supplied him with flour and a fat dog to make a feast. Beale was in their hands, helpless, when they were at war with the Mormons, the Mexicans, and our soldiers, and was treated as a brother by the young men—as a son by the aged chief. The account of it is too full of interest and instruction to be omitted here. It was after the loss of his arms, ammunition, and provisions in crossing the Grand river fork of the Great Colorado of the West. He had detached the strength of his party on a return expedition to New Mexico for supplies, hiding himself in the gorge of a mountain to escape detection and probable danger. He was discovered. Seeing the party approach, well mounted and armed, he went forth to meet them, invited them into his lodge of sticks and bushes; and, of his scant food, gave them part. They invited him to go to their village; he did not like the invitation, but knew that courage and confidence was the passport to safety. He went; and now hear the manner he was treated, told in his own words:

"A few hours' ride brought us to the Indian camp; and I wish I could here describe the beauty of the charming valley in which they lived. It was small, probably not more than five miles wide by fifteen long, but surrounded on all sides by the boldest mountains, covered to their summits with alternate patches of wood and grass, giving it the appearance of having been regularly laid off in small farms. Through the centre a fine bold stream, probably three feet deep by forty wide, watered the meadow land, and gave it the last touch which the valley required to make it the most beautiful I had ever seen. Hundreds of horses and goats were feeding on the meadows and hill sides, and the Indian lodges, with the women and children standing in front of them to look at the approaching stranger, strongly reminded me of old patriarchal times, when flocks and herds made the wealth and happiness of the people, and a tent was as good as a palace. I was conducted to the lodge of the Chief, an old and infirm man, who welcomed me kindly, and told me his young men had told him that I had given of my small store to them, and to 'sit in peace.' In about fifteen minutes a squaw brought in two large wooden platters, containing some very fat deer meat, and some boiled corn, to which I did ample justice. After this followed a dish which one must have been two weeks without bread to have appreciated as I did. Never at the most luxurious tables in Washington did I find a dish which appeared to me so perfectly without a parallel. It was some corn meal boiled in goat's milk, with a little elk fat. I think I certainly ate half a peck of this delicious atole; and when about to start back to my lodge, I found a large bag of dried meat, and a peck of corn put up for me to take to my people."

Such was his reception by these savages, in a state of war with all around them; the very reception, and the exact salutation, which the patriarchial pages of the Bible present us in so many instances.

Mr. Beale was superintendent then, and did more in that expedition through the heart of the Indian tribes to conciliate their good will and bind them to the United States, than any number of mere officials, without the gifts which give ascendant over the savage mind, could do in ages. He has been dismissed, and is deemed unworthy to serve this Government, with what reason will yet be seen; but he could go now, without Government authority, and without guards, through every hostile tribe west of the Mississippi, ascertaining every cause of war, and the terms upon which every one could be settled.

Mr. Chairman, we have some sculpture in the great rotunda of this Capitol which separates the two Halls of Congress—the subjects being incidents of Indian intercourse with our race in this, our part of the American continent. Over the east door, indicative of our line of approach, are the Pilgrim fathers stepping ashore on the rock which history and tradition consecrates; meeting them are the children of the forest, extending the maize, symbol of hospitality. Further round towards the north is the figure of a young Indian woman throwing herself under the uplifted war-club, to save the life of the captive white man. Over the north door is a venerable looking white man buying a domain from the red men, and giving them some bits of cloth and trinkets in exchange. Further round still, and over the west door—ominous direction! is the white man and the Indian engaged in deadly strife! the Indian, not being the sculptor, of course, the vanquished. Sir, in ancient times national history was written in sculpture, as we still see in the exhumed ruins of Nineveh and Babylon. Doubtless our artist was only figuring detached scenes, without any view to their historical connection and import; but the reflecting mind may see history in them, and suppose a design to write it. It is history! the history of our Indian intercourse!—hospitable reception, land taken, Indians killed. Is there not enough in this history to induce us to stop, and think, and try to settle, with all possible gentleness, these calamitous Indian wars, of which our own dreadful misconduct has been too much the cause?

THE SMITHSONIAN INSTITUTION.

SPEECH OF HON. JAS. MEACHAM,

OF VERMONT,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

March 3, 1855.

The House being in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union—

Mr. MEACHAM said:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: It was not my intention to offer any remarks during this session with reference to the Smithsonian Institution. After mature deliberation and consultation with judicious friends of learning, I came to the conclusion that the affairs of that establishment required investigation. I proposed the matter to this House. They sustained the proposition, and appointed a special committee of inquiry. To them I hoped the matter would be left till their report should be presented. I believed, sir, that in the hands of a select committee of this House, the interests of literature and science connected with the Smithsonian Institution would be safe.

But the unexpected course of the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. ENGLISH,] in stepping forward to eulogize the Institution before it had been attacked here, seems to require me briefly to explain and defend my position. For such explanation and defense, I may, in the main, rely on the able and important report presented by the select committee, which, for that purpose, I propose, in substance, to insert in my speech, confining my own remarks to some topics not alluded to by the committee.

The gentleman from Indiana, and some others, seem disposed to view this investigation as indicating deliberate hostility; as intended to give "to the disappointed and dissatisfied an opportunity of assailing the Institution at the public expense;" as manifesting disrespect to the distinguished and honored gentlemen concerned in conducting its affairs, particularly by clothing this committee with power to send for persons and papers. Sir, I do not yield to the honorable gentleman in my sincere attachment to the cause of knowledge, whether in the form of literature or of science. But the very devotion which I feel, leads me to wish to keep its fountains clean. I would not willingly lend myself to the aid of wanton and wicked assaults, nor is it to be supposed that this committee would be less scrupulous; but I believe that "the disappointed and dissatisfied" may sometimes deserve, or need, protection and redress. I would not be wanting in respect for men in exalted positions; but I know that under the authority of the purest and most elevated, abuses may arise, and require investigation, though not the imputation of individual blame. I am not the first member of the Board of Regents who has believed that the Institution had departed from the course marked out for it by Congress. One who had a large share in shaping its charter, within the first three years of its history declared in his place in this House, that he "believed the Board of Regents would be, and ought to have been long since, made acquainted with its direct responsibility to the power that had created it." And lately, a very distinguished member of the board resigned his seat in consequence of his conviction that the administration of the Institution was not in accordance with the law.

In this country there is, perhaps, no precedent for an investigation in all respects like this; simply because, before the existence of the Smithsonian Institution, there had not been, under the direction of our Government, any establishment for the promotion of knowledge in general. But we are not at a loss for precedents. The British Museum served as a model with many of those actively engaged in framing the charter of the Smithsonian Institution. It is under Government control. During the last twenty years its affairs have twice been made the subject of investigations by select committees of the House of Commons, and once by a special royal commission. The committees and the commission were each clothed with power to send for persons and papers. That Institution was under the management of the highest dignitaries and the first noblemen of the realm.

In the debate in the House of Commons on the appointment of one of these committees, Mr. Warburton quoted the complaints of Sir Humphrey Davy, that "there must be a general change in everything belonging to the Institution before a proper system of radical improvement could be effected;" and Mr. Hume declared "that it was imperative on the gentlemen connected with that Institution to defend themselves, and unless they make a good defense, it would be impossible for Parliament to allow them to continue in their present condition."

Mr. Chairman, it is not my intention to follow the gentleman from Indiana through his remarks; I shall confine myself to a few of the most important points. The gentleman maintains that the provisions of the act of Congress have been observed. This is the main issue between the two parties to this Smithsonian controversy, and is ably discussed in the report of the select committee.

The view which the committee have taken of the meaning of the law was that of the first regents, fresh from their labors in framing the charter, and unbiased by influences subsequently brought to bear upon them.

On the second day of their first session, a committee was appointed upon the clause requiring the appropriation for a library, and instructed "to prepare a report upon the subject of the formation of such a library, indicating its general character," &c.

In their report, which was long and elaborate, the committee say: "They see in the language of the act, which the regents are created to administer, and in the history of the passage of that act, a clear intimation that such a library was regarded by Congress as prominent among the more important means of increasing and diffusing knowledge among men. This intimation they think should control, in a great degree, the acts of the regents. They will not, however, withhold the expression, that the apparent policy of Congress in this particular is marked by profound wisdom, that it rests on a right construction of the terms and an enlarged appreciation of the spirit of the bequest." They recommended the appropriation of $20,000 of the income "for the present," to the library, independent of salaries, and this recommendation was adopted. I pause to remark, that if this resolution had been carried out, we should, even now, have much the largest library in this country. It would be something to have, to see, to use, to grow. And I ask you to place beside this the half dozen quarto and the half dozen octavo volumes published by the Institution, and tell me which you would prefer? Which would tend most for the increase and diffusion of knowledge?

Instead of this library what have we? Why, sir, a meager collection of some fourteen thousand volumes, besides pamphlets, &c., made up of copyright books, imperfect sets of periodicals and publications of societies, and university theses—with doubtless a good proportion of important and valuable works. But the whole how insignificant in comparison with the great and noble design! We have heard it stated that the library is worth $40,000. This is a preposterously exaggerated estimate. I do not believe that an intelligent bookseller could be found who would value it at a third of the sum! If the value of the museum and apparatus be equally exaggerated, we must abate largely from the vaunted possessions of the institution. And then, sir, this library is cramped into inconvenient and uncomfortable quarters, and shut up from the public, at a time, too, when there is an unusual concourse of people at the Institution.

As to the origin of the present difficulties, I particularly demur to the statement of the gentleman from Indiana. He represents the question to have been whether the funds should be used to build up a library as a paramount object, or whether they should be applied, not only for a library, but for such other purposes as the regents might think would best accord with the will of Smithson and the act of Congress. Not so, sir. The present difficulties originated in a proposition to annul the "compromise" which divided the income equally between the library and the museum on one part, and publications, researches, and lectures on the other; for the purpose of giving more to the latter department, making that the paramount and controlling interest.

Let me briefly explain this compromise.

The first sense of the regents respecting the library, was soon contested under a new reading of the law, one which made the section authorizing the regents to dispose of a possible surplus or residuum, the chief clause of the act, overriding all the rest, and overruling all other details. Under this construction, new purposes were to be introduced; purposes dissimilar to those provided; purposes which had been proposed to, and discussed and rejected by Congress—namely, the publication of books, and the instituting of scientific researches.

The early days of the Institution seemed likely to be embittered by controversy resulting from this new movement; but, in a magnanimous spirit of conciliation, the friends of the library agreed to a "compromise," dividing the income, after the building should be completed, equally between the library and museum on one side, and publications, researches, and lectures on the other.

The friends of the library reconciled their course with the law thus: If $20,000 a year be expended for books during the four or five years while the building is in progress, we shall gather a considerable library, and then we may be justified in believing that, for the future, the share that will come to the library under the compromise, may be considered as meeting the requirements of the law; the friends of the scientific scheme will be propitiated, and perpetual harmony secured.

I think, sir, that they strained their discretion; but they acted in a spirit of conciliation, worthy of a fairer requital than it has met.

Let this matter be distinctly understood. The friends of the library did not begin this controversy. They held to the compromise, and asked only that it should be faithfully administered. They demanded no more for the library than it was entitled to under the compromise. They did not ask that it should be made the paramount interest (although some of us believe that such is its legal position.) We were content to abide by the compact; we so voted. It was the proposition, coming from the advocates of the publication system, to annul the compromise, and reduce the library to the condition of a mere appendage of the new purposes, that led to discussion, and finally, through much irritation, to our present position.

We are not in anywise responsible for these difficulties. We plant ourselves on the law. For the sake of peace, we have been willing to adhere to the compromise. We have had reason to raise the controversy on other grounds, for although the resolution of the board giving $20,000 of the income to the library was not repealed, the money was withheld. As an offset, the compromise was to be observed before the finishing of the building. We think it was not fairly administered. We did not, however, take issue on that point, but only on the formal proposition to rescind.

We may not inaptly retort insinuations of illiberality. We hold to the law, and the law requires a universal library, one "composed of valuable works in all departments of knowledge;" one for the man of science, the artist, the mechanic, the historian, the scholar, the seeker of knowledge of whatever name; one open to men of all States and all nations. But we are called upon to yield up everything to men of science. The scientific men are down upon us, as if their craft were in danger. They come in societies, and as individuals. Smithson, though a chemist, and member of the Royal Society, appears to have been a man of general culture, and to have had a sympathy for "knowledge," without any restrictive epithets. By consulting solely the wishes of one particular class of the devotees of knowledge, who cherish only what is called science, we should limit his intentions,

"And give up to party what was meant for mankind."

I have not sought letters of recommendation for the library plan, nor have others for me. I doubt not I could have obtained thousands. To show them on either side seems to me idle parade. We doubt not that librarians in Athens and Paris are glad to get handsome books from America, and are ready to praise them before our traveling countrymen. 'Tis polite to do so. We doubt not that scientific men like to have means of publishing their works, too heavy for booksellers. We need not here doubt that it may sometimes be useful to publish, gratuitously, books that people do not care enough about to buy. But the question here is, can the Smithsonian Institution lawfully devote itself to such a purpose exclusively or principally?

The gentleman from Indiana puts prominently forward the fact that the funds of the Institution have not been squandered. This seems irrelevant, for it had not been so charged. But he thinks it a high meed of praise that its capital has been augmented. If the object of the Institution were the increase of its wealth, this would indeed be just cause for satisfaction. But, sir, this establishment was created, not to hoard money, not to speculate upon it, not to increase its income, but to expend money "for the increase and diffusion of knowledge." We want knowledge more than gold. We have no commission to accumulate for future benefit, but to spend for continual profit. We should remember,

"There is that scattereth and yet increaseth; and there is that withholdeth more than is meet, but it tendeth to poverty."

It is asked, if Smithson intended a library, would he not have said so? I reply by asking, if he had meant a learned society, would he not have said so? He knew all about learned societies, and seems to have become dissatisfied with them. I cannot suppose that he meant to indicate anything in particular and exclusively; but I suppose he intended to give his money to whatever the United States, in the discretion of its Government, might deem best suited to promote his general purpose.

For one, sir, I suppose that Smithson regarded the foundation of a "Smithsonian Institution," from his property, as only a possibility. Look at the facts. He left the income of his property, for life, to a nephew, and the property, "absolutely and forever," to the descendants of the nephew, if he had any, "legitimate or illegitimate." The nephew was a young man leading a roving life in France and Italy. What was the chance that the contingency would ever arrive when the United States could claim the legacy—that of failure of descendants of the nephew? A sentence has been quoted from one of his papers to the purport that his name would live in the memories of men when the titles of the Percys and Northumberlands were extinct or forgotten, and it seems to be inferred that he was then thinking of this Institution. But it is altogether more likely he was thinking of the articles which he had published in the Philosophical Transactions. Every scientific man deems the acceptance of his articles there a sure passport to immortality; and this view is rendered more probable by what is asserted, that he took such offense at the rejection of one of his papers by the Royal Society as to change his will. But I do not, after all, see the applicability of this; for the name of Smithson would be as much attached to the Smithsonian Institution, and live with it as long and as honorably, if that Institution becomes what Congress intended, as if it becomes anything else. Is not the British Museum or the Bodleian Library as well known as any other institution in the world?

To the phrase "active operations," I will devote a passing word.

The publication of books and the assumption of researches have been called "active operations," as if everything else were in comparison but standstill. I should have liked to see activity in finishing the building, and in filling it with the stores of knowledge. Active operations of this kind would have tended "to stimulate and invigorate the mind for original thought, and supply important materials for investigation," to use the language of one of the gentlemen who has been quoted to show that anything but an exclusive devotion of this fund to science is a "gross perversion" of the trust. It has been repeated to me that another of these gentlemen was in the habit a few years ago of saying, "you can do nothing for science in this country till you have books—large libraries"—and this he said in special reference to the Smithsonian library. But then, sir, the Smithsonian question had not become one of physical science versus everything else.

One gentleman refers to the great Humboldt as not the possessor of a private library. But he had constant access to the Royal Library of Berlin, one of the best in the world. Now, what we want is to furnish scientific and literary men in this country with such public facilities for research, that they will not, on the one hand, be obliged to expend their limited means in buying for themselves, nor, on the other, abandon their researches for the want of books. For us, this case of Humboldt is remarkably apropos.

In order to show how intensely active these "active operations" are, the gentleman from Indiana has quoted a long list of works published by the Institution. But, sir, you will, probably, be surprised to learn that, with the exception of a few octavo pamphlets, making in all only about one thousand pages, the first six titles include the whole that follow. The rest are merely the table of contents of the first six. Six quarto volumes, making less than three thousand pages and about enough in octavo to make a volume of one thousand pages exhibit the sum and substance of the "active operations" of the Smithsonian Institution for eight years—say five hundred pages, great and small, a year.

I have heard it argued that the "active operations" are justifiable, on the ground that Congress ordained a laboratory, that a laboratory implies researches, and researches must be published. But, sir, I have looked through the Smithsonian publications, and made inquiries with the view of ascertaining what results they contain, procured at the Smithsonian laboratory. I could find none. I ask where are the Smithsonian researches? Where are the "new truths" which have been developed at the Smithsonian? The books published were contributed to knowledge by the authors who wrote them, for the most part without pay. The Smithsonian merely published them. The Smithsonian laboratory is next to nothing, and nothing but experiments and illustrations for lectures have come from it, as yet, so far as I can find.

Now these operations are held up as the exponent of American activity in discovering new truths. I do not find any very efficacious activity; and as to the proportion of absolutely new truths due directly to the Smithsonian among these publications, I fear they would, notwithstanding all the talk about them,

> "Should some cold critic dare to melt them down,
> Roll in his crucible a shapeless mass,
> A grain of gold leaf to a pound of brass."

I do not, sir, by any means object to these publications, on the ground that they do not contain new truths. I go for truth, old or new; but I object to the holding them up before the world as the measure of American active operations in the discovery of truth, and as conveying the idea that the Smithsonian Institution is the great active truth-discovering engine of American science. The idea that it has been so, or would become so, although it has done more than all else to encourage the present course of the institution, is, in my opinion, fallacious. It cannot, I think, be too strongly represented that discoveries are not made by direct active operations of societies anywhere, but by the active operations of individual minds, which minds may be in various ways brought up to the effort. The hope of reward may, indeed, serve sometimes as a stimulus; but I believe that the history of science shows that such rewards are generally valuable as rewards rather than as incentives. The hope of having results published, with the stamp of high approval, may operate as an incentive to effort. But incentives, especially in this country, are less needed than means and aids; and a library is one of the most effectual, and, especially in this country, the most needed, as a means and aid to exertion in the advancement of knowledge.

Mr. Chairman, on this last day of the session, I have not the time to produce the multitude of considerations which crowd upon me on this subject, but I am happy to be able to present those most important in the lucid argument and appropriate language of the select committee. I beg leave, therefore, to read and print the following copious extracts from their report:

"In discharging the main part of their duty relating to the management of the Institution, whether it has been in accordance with the law, and to the question whether any further legislation is necessary, the committee will, in the first place, present such a history of the whole matter as will, in conjunction with the evidence presented in the appendix to this report, enable every member of the House to form a judgment on the subject."

Then, after quoting the will of Smithson, and the act of Congress accepting the bequest, the committee proceed:

"It will be perceived that, in the foregoing act, the Government of the United States pledged itself that 'any and all sums of money and other funds which shall be received for or on account of the said legacy, shall be applied in such manner as CONGRESS may hereafter direct,' &c. It is presumed that it is our duty to consider, not whether the funds have been applied to such objects, and in such a way as Congress ought to have directed, in the opinion of any individuals, but to such objects, and in such a way as Congress, in fulfillment of the foregoing pledge, has directed. The next step, therefore, is to ascertain what was the determination of Congress on the subject.

"Great caution and deliberation were exercised in determining the matter. The country felt that it was a solemn and momentous trust. The gratitude, pride, honor, and wisdom of the nation were involved. Not only the then present generation, but future ages were interested. The field to be surveyed was the whole country, and the whole world beyond the limits of the country. It was obvious that the nature of our institutions presented some peculiar difficulties in the way of executing the trust. If the testator had understood, as indeed but few foreigners ever have done, those difficulties, he might, perhaps, have made some arrangement to avoid them. It is clearly not within the sphere allotted to this Federal Government to enter the fields of science and literature. In point of fact, the action of Congress in accepting the bequest and agreeing to carry it into execution, was justified at the time, on the ground of its peculiar and complete jurisdiction over the District of Columbia. More than ten years were consumed in discussions, debates, and conflicting views and schemes, in and out of Congress."

After detailing these schemes at considerable length, and giving the parliamentary history of the act organizing the present Institution, which shows that the bill was shaped by successive amendments so as "to direct the appropriation ENTIRELY to the purposes of a LIBRARY," and quoting the act in full, the committee say:

"The foregoing act of Congress is 'the law establishing the Smithsonian Institution.' It is the directory which the regents are bound to follow in administering its affairs and applying its funds. An idea seems to have crept into the discussions that are prevalent on this subject that the will requires one thing and the law another. There can be no ground for this distinction, as a few words will show.

"The will declares a certain object, namely, 'for the increase and diffusion of knowledge among men.' In accepting the bequest, the Government of the United States pledged its faith, that the funds should be 'applied, as Congress may hereafter direct, to the purpose of founding and endowing at Washington, under the name of the Smithsonian Institution, an establishment for the increase and diffusion of knowledge among men.'

"The act establishing the Institution also, inserts into its title and into its body the words of the will, so that whatever the will requires, the act ordains, and there can be no conflict between them. No one can question the obligation of those who administer the Institution, under the act, to assume that its requirements are in accordance with the will, and to carry them out in good faith and good earnest. So far as the act leaves the officers, who exist by its authority, to their discretion, that discretion is to be guided by their sense of the import and design of the language of the will. All in the will that relates to the subject is incorporated into the act. We have occasion, therefore, to look only at the act in ascertaining the duty of those who administer the affairs of the Institution, and there can be no ground for a controversy in reference to the meaning of the will, as against the act, or vice versa.

"The will, and the two acts of Congress that have been spread out upon the foregoing pages in full, interpret themselves to the common sense and adequate apprehension of every reader. It is only necessary to regard the words as used in their ordinary sense, to avoid a mental interpolation of language not in the text, and to allow its natural meaning to flow out from all the language used in the instrument. In this spirit of fair and unstrained interpretation, we propose to consider for a moment the language of the act establishing the Smithsonian Institution, of which different and conflicting interpretations are advocated.

"The word 'INCREASE' is held by some of the zealous combatants in the Smithsonian controversy to be identical with 'DISCOVERY.' The idea seems to be that knowledge can only be increased by the discovery of new truth. This is an arbitrary and untenable position. A mind experiences an increase of knowledge if it knows more than it did before, although all the ideas it has received may be in the commonest text books. There has been an increase of knowledge in the school, or the congregation, or the lecture room, if ideas not before known to them have been received into the minds of the hearers, even, indeed, it matters not if those ideas have been recorded for thousands of years in languages, classical or sacred, that have been dead long ago. Knowledge has been increased if one mind has received more, whether it be new or old truth. The language of Smithson is perfectly simple, and in its natural sense covers the whole ground; it includes, but does not require new truth. Truth discovered a thousand years ago is as good as truth discovered yesterday. Knowledge embraces it all alike, and Smithson's object was to carry knowledge where it was not before, and to increase it where it was; to spread it over a wider area and to a greater depth.

"In like manner a particular meaning has been crowded upon the word 'KNOWLEDGE;' not its ordinary meaning in common usage, but a narrow, technical, and special meaning. This has been done by confounding it with 'SCIENCE.' It is true that in their primitive origin or roots, in the languages from which they are derived, these words may be identical in their meaning; but not so, as actually used in common conversation and familiar and general literature. 'Knowledge' is all comprehensive, embracing science, art, literature, politics, business, the whole world of nature and culture, the entire realm of facts and reality, all ages and all that they have contained. 'Science' is almost universally employed to denote those branches of knowledge which are systematized into a distinct organization or arrangement, based upon definite principles and reduced to particular rules. In the progress of knowledge new sciences are added to the list, and in the establishment of new classifications, the boundary lines are altered. There is a vast amount of knowledge not included in any science. Further, the word science is sometimes used to embrace only a part of what, in a broader sense, is included in the sciences. It is getting to become quite generally used to denote what are called the physical sciences, excluding political, moral, and intellectual science—excluding history, the arts, and all general literature. Surely it cannot be maintained that 'knowledge' was used by Smithson as merely identical with 'science' in this last mentioned and most limited sense.

"The words 'among men' were used merely to corroborate the idea expressed by the word 'diffusion.' They do not necessarily imply that the Institution should confine itself to world-wide operations. The word is not, as some seem to suppose, 'mankind,' but 'men;' and he diffuses knowledge 'among men' as truly, and in as full a sense, when he enlightens the minds of his neighbors, as of persons at the very farthest pole. He best fulfills the idea of Smithson, who increases human intelligence, whenever and wherever he has an opportunity, in every circle of influence, however near or however remote.

"The seventh section of the act establishing the Institution has given occasion to a difference of interpretation that has been brought to the notice of the committee. The section relates to the duties and powers of the secretary, and goes on to say that 'the said secretary shall also discharge the duties of librarian and keeper of the museum, and may, with the consent of the Board of Regents, employ assistants; and the said officers shall receive for their services such sums as may be allowed by the Board of Regents, to be paid semi-annually on the first days of January and July; and the said officers shall be removable by the Board of Regents whenever, in their judgment, the interests of the Institution require any of the said officers to be changed.'

"The committee cannot but think it strange that, in the face of this express language, it has been made a question where the power of removal is lodged. 'Said officers shall be removable by the Board of Regents.' Can anything be plainer? In defense of the idea that the secretary can remove his assistants, a practice is cited in certain departments of the Government where the power of removal is exercised by intermediate officials; but there is no analogy, inasmuch as the Constitution of the United States is silent in reference to the removal of such officers. But the constitution of the Smithsonian Institution is not silent, but expressly defines in whom the power to remove the assistants of the secretary resides, namely, in the Board of Regents. They have no more power to delegate or pass over to another, that power, than they have to transfer any of their other functions.

"The concluding sentence of the eighth section of the act is as follows; 'And the said regents shall make, from the interest of said fund, an appropriation not exceeding an average of $25,000 annually for the gradual formation of a library composed of valuable works pertaining to all departments of human knowledge.' The expression 'not exceeding' is in constant use in the legislation of Congress, and in all legislation, everywhere, in which appropriations are made; and it will not be disputed that, in all instances, the expectation and general understanding of the Legislature is that about the amount thus specified will be expended. The word 'average' can only be considered as indicating the expectation of the Legislature that the sum expended in some years might exceed $25,000. The word was used in order to give the managers authority, in case a sum less than $25,000 were expended one year, to expend just so much more the next, and vice versa. No doubt, we think, can be entertained that the framers and enactors of the law expected that about $200,000 would be expended 'for the gradual formation of a library, composed of valuable works pertaining to all departments of human knowledge,' in eight years. If the law does not contemplate that the annual expenditure for the formation of a library shall be something like $25,000, any other figures might as well have been used. If the administrators of the law are at liberty to spend as little as they may please for a library, in the face of the sum thus indicated in the law, they would have been equally at liberty, whatever sum might have been named, whether $30,000 or $40,000. In other words, if the clause of the act under consideration can be construed as justifying an annual average expenditure for the gradual formation of a library of less than $2,000, any intermediate sum, between that and the entire income of the fund, would have been of equal authority and significance, as indicating the intention of the Legislature, whichever of the intermediate sums might have been inserted in the act; that is to say, those who maintain that the language and design of the act are carried out by expending less than $2,000 annually for books, assume and assert that it would not have altered the sense of the act had $2,000, or $10,000, or $40,000 been the sum actually named in it, instead of $25,000.

"The ninth section of the act is as follows:

"'And be it further enacted, That of any other moneys which have accrued, or shall hereafter accrue, as interest upon the said Smithsonian fund, not herein appropriated, or not required for the purposes herein provided, the said managers are hereby authorized to make such disposal as they shall deem best suited for the promotion of the purpose of the testator; anything herein contained to the contrary notwithstanding.'

"The discretion allowed to the managers in the latter part of this section, must be considered as limited, in some sense, by the word 'other,' applied to 'moneys,' and more definitely and most absolutely by the clauses 'not herein appropriated,' and 'not required for the purposes herein provided.'

"The meaning of the ninth section seems to us to be simply this: That if, after all has been done required by the foregoing provisions of the act, (that is, for the maintenance and preservation of a geological and mineralogical cabinet, a laboratory, library, gallery of art, lecture rooms, lectures, the purchase of books on the scale indicated in the eighth section, and the discharge of all current obligations,) an unexpended balance of the annual income remains, the managers may do with it just what they please—may expend it upon books, if they like, even although the expenditure for that object may have already reached the assigned limit, or upon any object not named or alluded to in the act, if, in their judgment, 'suited for the promotion of the purpose of the testator.'"

"There is nothing in our constitutional system that authorizes this Government to enter the sphere of literature and science. Education is left to the States. This Government cannot, without violating the principles on which it rests, become, directly or indirectly, through its official agents, or in the expenditure of funds, a censor of any department of the press, an arbiter of science, or a publisher of works of mere literature or philosophy, any more than of morals or theology. No amount of money that could possibly be raised would enable this Government to perform these functions with a just, equal, and liberal hand, for the benefit of all departments of knowledge. Of course it has no right to make discriminations. Not only natural history, and physical science, but every branch of learning and inquiry, has a right to demand patronage, if it is extended to any. Whatever project, in this line, may be attempted, will be found surrounded with insuperable embarrassments. If, for instance, the funds of the Smithsonian Institution should be appropriated in the manner proposed in the petition from citizens of Missouri, referred to this committee, for the preparation and distribution of a monthly report of the general progress of knowledge, who shall write those reports? To what school of philosophy, or medicine, or politics, shall he belong? Shall he confine himself, as the Smithsonian Institution has for the most part very wisely done, to particular provinces of natural science, to reptiles, defunct species of animals, mathematical and astronomical computations, and researches, to aboriginal antiquities, and the glossaries of vanishing tribes of Indians? Or shall he rise above dead and brute nature and treat the subject of MAN, of civil society, of government, of politics, and religion? If he confines himself to the former, not one in ten thousand of the people will be interested or satisfied. If he attempts the latter, he is on forbidden ground, and cannot escape being torn to pieces by parties, sects, and sectaries.

"Moving in the most cautious manner, acting within the most limited sphere, grudges are multiplied, jealousies engendered, resentments kindled, and complaints encountered in all directions. Authors whose pieces are rejected, will be likely, in the course of time, to outnumber those who are admitted to the favored circle. One man has the gratification of seeing his work printed at the public charge, in a splendid style, and circulated, without trouble or expense on his part, to all the learned societies and persons in Christendom, and of feeling that a world wide reputation is secured to him. But others, whose treatises have been condemned by a secret tribunal, and returned with the stigma of rejection, are brooding in sullen, or breaking out in vehement resentment and indignation.

"Men of genius are sensitive; scientific authors and discoverers particularly so. To attain great excellence in any department it must be studied and prosecuted with exclusive and all-absorbing zeal. There is a divinity in truth, and whoever attains any portion of it, is prone to worship it with a concentrated devotion, and to cherish it as more precious than all things else. However minute the objects, or narrow the province, or apparently useless the results of the researches of the man of science, he is wholly wrapt up in them, and feels, to his very heart's core, that nothing transcends them in importance. This makes him sensitive to reputation, tenacious of rights, and morbidly alive to any encroachment upon his labors or attainments. No office is more thankless than to attempt to arbitrate the differences of men of science. No offense is more keenly resented than to discredit their claims or slight their productions. It is a curious circumstance, and most instructive in this connection, strikingly illustrating the fact we are presenting, that James Smithson, who was a Fellow of the Royal Society, had made a will, leaving his whole fortune to that institution, which had honored many of his productions by publishing them in its transactions. At length, certain papers, offered to them for publication, were refused. Under the sting of resentment and wounded pride, he changed his will, and left his fortune to the United States of America. In this way, a harvest of dissatisfaction and animosity is constantly maturing. Patronage, in politics, is the fatal bane of parties; in literature and science, it works disastrously, in all directions, upon him who dispenses, upon those who receive, and upon all from whom it is withheld."

After giving the organization of the two visitorial and executive boards of the Institution, ("the Establishment," so called, and the "Board of Regents,") and naming the officers and committees engaged in its active government, the committee say:

"The committee feel it their duty to submit a few remarks in relation to this organization.

"It appears by the evidence that so much of it as is called the "Establishment," has never performed any part whatever in the administration of the Institution.

"It is obvious that those Regents who reside at a great distance from Washington can have but little to do with its management. Those of them who are members of the Senate, and House of Representatives, unless their residence during the recess of Congress is in the vicinity of Washington, cannot be expected, for the most part, to have that influence over its operations which those who reside permanently at the seat of Government, or in its immediate vicinity, will more naturally exercise. The Executive Committee is the body in which the government substantially exists.

"It may well be questioned whether it is expedient to surround such an Institution with an array of high official dignitaries. Their great offices and characters are committed to all the proceedings of the Institution, while it is impossible for them to give much time and attention to their examination. When the venerable Chief Justice of the United States, after hearing both parties, and a thorough scrutiny of the merits of all questions involved, and in the exercise of the high function to which his life is consecrated and set apart, pronounces a solemn judgment from the bench, we bow to his learning and wisdom, but it may perhaps be doubted whether it is expedient to attempt to make him responsible for all the doings of an Institution entirely out of the sphere of his duties and pursuits, and with whose officers he cannot have much communication. As it has been ascertained that the Institution is not a corporation, and its anomalous character in that respect may give rise to perplexing and unforeseen difficulties that will reach the legal tribunals, it may well be questioned whether that august judicial personage ought to be mixed up at all with its business details.

"If the Institution could be organized in a simpler form, and its secretary made the head of a bureau in the Department of the Interior, and subject, like other heads of bureaus, to the Secretary of the Interior, he might pursue, substantially, the same course as at present, if that should continue to be thought advisable, with a clearly ascertained line of duty and responsibility, and a full adjustment of all his relations, above to the head of the Department, around to his associates, and to all subordinates of every grade. This, however, we desire to have considered as a mere suggestion made in passing. If all other plans are found defective, and beset with inconveniences, this may, at some future day, be tried in the last resort.

"Whatever arrangements may be made for the administration of the Institution, it is of extreme importance that the relations among the several officers attached to it be defined and settled by law, or, at any rate, by by-laws. In every organization to which several officers are attached, such a provision is highly desirable, but preeminently so where the said officers are gentlemen of scientific and literary attainment and reputation. The spirit of self-respect, and a sensitiveness to personal rights, prevail nowhere with greater keenness and intensity than in the republic of letters.

"The Smithsonian Institution stands on a different footing from any in this country, and, in some particulars, especially in regard to the peculiar character of our Government, in any other country. In some leading features it, perhaps, bears a closer resemblance to the British Museum than to any other. The recent history of that institution may, perhaps, be found instructive to us.

"The British Museum was founded about a hundred years ago, upon the conditional bequest, by an individual, of property less in amount than the bequest of Smithson. It has since received some two million pounds sterling of the public funds.

"Within the last twenty years there have been two select committees of the House of Commons and one Royal Commission appointed to inquire into the condition, management, and affairs of this Institution.

"Its government is vested in a Board of Trustees, in number forty-eight, one of whom—H. R. H., the Duke of Cambridge—is directly named by the Crown; twenty-three are trustees ex officio; nine are named by the representatives or executors of parties who have been donors to the Institutions, and fifteen are elected.

The following is a list of the trustees:

[Ex-Officio.]

The Archbishop of Canterbury, } Principal
The Lord Chancellor, } Trustees.
The Speaker of the House of Commons. }
The President of the Council.
The first Lord of the Treasury.
The Lord privy seal.
The first Lord of the Admiralty.
The Lord Steward.
The Lord Chamberlain.
The Colonial Secretary of State.
The Foreign Secretary of State.
The Home Secretary of State.
The Bishop of London.
The Chancellor of the Exchequer.
The Lord Chief Justice of the Queen's Bench.
The Lord Chief Justice of the Common Pleas.
The Master of the Rolls.
The Attorney General.
The Solicitor General.
The President of the Royal Society.
The President of the College of Physicians.
The President of the Society of Antiquaries.
The President of the Royal Academy.

[Family Trustees.]

The Earl of Cardigan, } Sloane family.
Lord Stanley. }
George Booth Tyndale, Esq., } Cotton family.
Rev. Francis Annesley. }
Lord H. W. Bentinck, } Harleian family.
The Earl of Cawdor. }
Charles Townly, Esq., Townly family.
The Earl of Elgin, Elgin family.
John Knight, Esq., Knight family.

[Elected Trustees.]

The Earl of Aberdeen.
The Earl of Derby.
The Duke of Rutland.
The Marquis of Lansdowne.
Sir Robert Peel, Bart.
The Duke of Hamilton.
Sir Robert H. Inglis, Bart.
Henry Hallam, Esq.
Wm. R. Hamilton, Esq.
The Duke of Sutherland.
The Right Hon. T. B. Macaulay.
Wm. Buckland, D. D., Dean of Westminster.
The Right Hon. Sir David Dundas.
The Right Hon. H. Goulburn.
The Marquis of Northampton.

"Complaints against the management of the Institution became so prevalent that, notwithstanding the mighty array of elevated functionaries, and illustrious literary and scientific persons behind which it was entrenched, it became necessary for the House of Commons to turn its attention to it.

"On the 27th of March, 1835, it was ordered in the House of Commons, 'That a select committee be appointed to inquire into the condition, management, and affairs of the British Museum,' with power to send for persons and papers. The committee consisted of thirty-three, including many of the leading men of the House.

"The committee held nineteen meetings, and on the 6th of August, 1835, reported a mass of testimony, making a folio volume of six hundred and twenty-three pages.

"On the 11th of February, 1836, the subject was again taken up, and became the occasion of a debate. Among other complaints made by members, it was affirmed that the statement made by Sir Humphrey Davy was correct, 'that the Archbishop of Canterbury, the Lord Chancellor, and the Speaker of the House of Commons, were considered as the real acting governors of the institution.' A new committee of fifteen was appointed, composed of distinguished persons, and authorized to send for persons, papers, and records. It held twenty-eight meetings, and reported to the House of Commons on the 14th of July, 1836. Certain improvements were made in the condition of the institution, as the result of these parliamentary proceedings."

"The public mind seems to have become again excited on the subject by complaints arising from the community, and from officers of the institution; and in 1847 a royal commission was formed, consisting of four noblemen and eight commoners, all eminent persons. They prosecuted their researches with great diligence, and the result of their labors in 1850 was a folio volume of more than one thousand pages. The whole number of questions and answers is ten thousand nine hundred and thirty-three. The chairman of the commission was the Earl of Ellesmere. He presented an elaborate, full, and independent report. One or two extracts may be read with advantage by those who have the management of literary and scientific institutions.

"'Such a board of trustees, to any one who considers the individuals who compose it, with reference to their rank, intelligence, and ability, would give assurance, rather than promise, of the most unexceptionable, and, indeed, wisest administration in every department. High attainments in literature and in science, great knowledge and experience of the world and its affairs, and practised habits of business, distinguish many of them in an eminent degree; and it would be unjust either to deny the interest which all of them feel in the prosperity of the institution, or refrain from acknowledging the devoted services which some of them have rendered in its administration. But, on the other hand, absorbing public cares, professional avocations, and the pursuits of private life, must, in many instances, prevent those individuals, whose assistance might have been best relied on, from giving any thing like continued attention to the affairs of the institution.'

"While the report alludes, in the above language, to the inability of such official persons, in general, to attend with sufficient particularity to any extra business, incidental to affairs out of the sphere of their more appropriate duties, it makes an exception in favor of the Archbishop of Canterbury, who, in the words of the report, 'gave to its affairs more time and attention than we could have supposed it possible for a person the most active to have spared from his momentous and sacred duties.'

"The commissioners dwell at length upon the fact that the trustees were not in the habit of communicating directly with any other officers of the institution but the secretary, as in the following passage:

"'The secretary attends all the meetings, and the officers of the establishment, generally, are perfectly aware of the extent of his influence and control over the business, while he has no direct responsibility for the conduct or actual state of any department.'

"'There may be many cases, certainly, in which it is not expedient only, but necessary, that the board should deliberate in the absence even of the principal librarian, or of the heads of departments; but these must be exceptional cases, and considering the persons who are heads of departments, and the knowledge and ability by which they are, and ought to be distinguished, it seems impossible to suppose that the trustees would not derive the greatest assistance from immediate, full, and unreserved communication with them on questions arising in the administration of their respective departments. We find, however, there is scarcely one of the highest officers of the institution who has not complained of systematic exclusion from the board when the affairs of his department are under consideration, as equally disparaging to himself, and injurious to the interests of the department, giving no opportunity of explaining their reports, or meeting the objections and criticisms to which they may have been subject; and their own absence, joined to that of the principal librarian, leaves them under the painful but natural impression, where their suggestions are disallowed, that the interests with which they are charged have not been fully represented. We cannot but ascribe to this cause the unfortunate and unseemly jealousies which the evidence shows to have long existed among the principal officers of the Museum—their distrust in the security of the means by which they communicate with the board; their misgivings as to the fullness and fairness of the consideration which their suggestions receive, and their feelings of injustice done to their own department, arising, it may be, from an over zeal for its interests, or an over estimate of its importance.'

"Finally, they use this language in reference to what they judge to be the too overshadowing power allowed to the secretary by the trustees:

"'From his control of the business, constant intercourse with the trustees, and attendance at all their meetings, he has risen to be the most important officer in the establishment, though without that responsibility which attached to the principal librarian and the heads of departments. The influence possessed by this officer in the affairs of the Museum has followed the usual course where the secretary is permanent, and where the administrative board is fluctuating, and must depend mainly upon the secretary for the information required in the dispatch of ordinary business.'

"The case of the British Museum confirms the conviction, that whatever power is lodged in the secretary—and we do not advise to encroach upon or diminish his authority—it is all important to have it defined and guided and guarded under express regulation. Gentlemen of education and refined sensibilities will be willing to conform to rules in the shape of law, but will always resent the exercise of absolute and unrestrained power. Every American heart instinctively resists arbitrary authority. No reasonable mind objects to conformity to established regulations, and obedience to defined, permanent, and uniform rules. Beyond those rules the rights of a subordinate officer are as perfect as those of any other man. Within them he feels that it is no degradation to obey. It is not at all improbable that many of the difficulties that have been encountered in the British Museum, and in the Smithsonian Institution, have arisen not so much from lodging too much power in the secretary, as from the absence of by-laws fully defining the powers, duties, and relations of all the officers employed in them. The committee is particularly desirous to have it understood that they feel justified in expressing a very decided opinion that the difficulties that have arisen, and which the evidence sufficiently discloses in the bosom of the Institution, and the dissatisfaction that may exist in some portions of the community, may safely be attributed to the causes just mentioned, and not in the least to any want of fidelity or zeal on the part of its managers.

"As it respects the general policy, advocated by the friends of a library, to make it the prominent feature of the Smithsonian Institution, the committee are of opinion that the funds of the Institution are sufficient to accomplish that object at a more rapid rate of gradual accumulation than heretofore, without essentially impairing the usefulness and efficacy of the policy pursued at present by the managers. Active operations, original researches, and the publication of scientific treatises, if the whole income were consumed in them, would have to be confined far within the limits of what would be desirable. A limitation must be suffered at some point within the income; and the satisfaction of the country is of greater importance than a few thousand dollars, more or less, expended in either direction.

"But a few words are needed to do justice to the value of a great universal library at the metropolis of the Union. Every person who undertakes to prepare and publish a book, on any subject, will be found to bear testimony to the need of such a library. The great historians and classical writers of the country have to send abroad, often to go abroad in person, in order to obtain materials for their works. All literary men are eager to inspect catalogues, and explore alcoves, in the prosecution of their favorite departments; and there is no direction in which they are more tempted to drain their frequently quite moderate resources, than in the purchase of books. Such a library as would be accumulated by an appropriation of $20,000 annually, for twenty years, judiciously expended, would be frequented by scholars and authors in much larger numbers than persons not acquainted with their wants will be likely to suppose. In half a century it would give to America a library unequalled in value, and probably in size, in the world.

"There is a special reason why such a library should be provided at the seat of the Federal Government. The annals of all other countries, running back into the past, are soon shrouded in fable, or lost in total darkness. But ours, during their whole duration, are within the range of unclouded history. The great social, moral, and political experiment here going on, to test the last hope of humanity, is capable of being described in clear and certain records. The history of each State and Territory can be written on the solid basis of ascertained facts. In each State and Territory there are, and from the first have been, many persons who are preparing, and have published, works illustrative of the entire progress of those respective communities. In local histories, commemorative addresses, and the vast variety of productions of this sort, our literature is rich and ample—beyond that of any other people. There is no way in which the patriotism and virtue of a people can be so effectually fostered and strengthened as by cherishing in their breasts an interest in their ancestry, in the incidents that have marked the fortunes of their States, their towns, and the scenes of their residence—the transmitted reminiscences of their homes and firesides. It would be a great and a good thing, could there be collected in a national library, in distinct alcoves, all valuable publications illustrating the history of the several States of the Union. Different processes of legislation, and various social and political influences, have operated upon them severally, and the records of the results ought to be here for the inspection and instruction of the Representatives of the people, of the people themselves, and of the whole world.

"But if every other description of books is avoided or crowded out, there is one which surely ought not to be. If the resources of the Institution are to be exclusively or mainly devoted to science rather than to general literature and knowledge, it ought, at any rate, to have within its walls a perfect and universal library of science and art; not merely modern science and recent researches, but all the publications of all ages, and all countries, that illustrate the progress of science, as such. If we cannot have a universal library, give us, at least, a scientific library, such as no other nation can boast.

"One advantage of a liberal expenditure for a library, not to be thought lightly of in a Government resting entirely on popular opinion, is that it results in something that shows for itself. The people can see in it what has become of the money. It would forever grow before their eyes, and in all coming generations, from its unapproached and ever expanding magnitude, would be an object of perpetually increasing national pride. Under the present policy, the funds disappear as they are expended, however salutary their application may have been, and the only monuments are a few volumes, admirable, no doubt, in their form and substance, highly appreciated by scientific societies at home and abroad, but never seen by the people.

"The short time allowed them, the necessary consequent inadequateness of their investigations and deliberations, and the impossibility of any legislative action by this Congress, restrain the committee from reporting any bill to the House; but, in view of all the circumstances, as a measure of peace, as a mutual concession, which, in such a matter, is the only way of settling a difficulty, they would express their conviction that the compromise adopted at an early day by the Board of Regents, ought to be restored, and that all desirable ends may be ultimately secured by dividing the income equally between the library and museum on the one part, and active operations on the other.

"The only other suggestion the committee have to make is, the expediency, in order to avoid all embarrassment in future, to have each division of the Institution placed under its proper and distinctive head. Let the secretary have charge of the active operations, preside over the scientific researches, and direct the publications. Let the librarian have charge of the library and museum. If the two departments are thus separated, and placed under the control of well devised and clearly defined regulations, never interfering with each other, but working freely and harmoniously in their respective spheres, each principal responsible only for his own province, and subject alike to a common head, whether the Secretary of the Interior or a Board of Regents, the Institution would, we think, be found to work more auspiciously, and produce the best and greatest results. For the committee,

"CHARLES W. UPHAM, Chairman."

GRANTS OF LAND FOR RAILROADS.

OF LOUISIANA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

February 28, 1855,

On the bill granting alternate sections of Land to aid in the construction of the Vicksburg and Shreveport Railroad.

Mr. PERKINS, of Louisiana, said:

Mr. SPEAKER: In offering the bill granting alternate sections of land to aid in the construction of the Vicksburg and Shreveport railroad, prepared by the Committee on Public Lands, as an amendment to the railroad bill now before the House, my object is to avoid anything like sectionalism in the passage of either of these bills. They are not so in their character, and should not be made to appear so by the mode of their introduction.

Substantially, the same bill that I now offer as an amendment has passed twice the Senate. It was introduced into this House last session, before any of the other bills now with the Committee on Public Lands, and, under the circumstances, I see no reason why its report should be delayed. It is in discharge, therefore, of a duty, and without reflecting upon the members of the committee for the order in which they are disposed to bring forward their bills, that I offer it at this time.

If it is voted down now, it will again come up, when reported by the committee, should the committee be again called.

My time will not permit me, Mr. Speaker, to do more than suggest the points I would wish to discuss fully before the House.

The action of past Congresses on the subject of railroads, the indorsement of the policy and constitutionality of the grants of alternate sections of land to aid in their construction by Mr. Calhoun, the reasoning of the President's first message on the subject, and the full approval of the same policy in the annual report of the Secretary of the Interior, makes entirely unnecessary any constitutional argument.

The third section of the fourth article of the Constitution says:

"Congress shall have power to dispose of, and make all needful rules and regulations respecting, the territory or other property belonging to the United States; and nothing in this Constitution shall be so construed as to prejudice any claims of the United States, or of any particular State."

Mr. Calhoun, in a report to the Senate on the memorial of the Memphis convention, at the session of 1845–'46, said:

"Your committee will next proceed to consider that portion of the memorial which relates to the communication by railroad between the valley of the Mississippi and the southern Atlantic States. They regard works of the kind as belonging to internal improvements, (that is, improvements within the body of the States,) and as such are, in their opinion, not embraced in the power to regulate commerce. But they are, nevertheless, of opinion, that where such roads, or other works of internal improvement, may pass through public lands, the United States may contribute to their construction in their character of proprietors, to the extent that they may be enhanced in price thereby. This has usually been done by ceding alternate sections on the projected line of such works, and it is believed that no mode of contribution more fair, or better calculated to guard against abuses, can be devised.

"That Congress has a right to make such contributions, where there is reasonable ground to believe that the public lands will be enhanced in proportion, under its right to dispose of 'the territory and other public property of the United States,' your committee cannot doubt. In making this assertion, they hold to the rule of strict construction; and that this power, like all the other powers of the Government, is a trust power, and, as such, is strictly limited by the nature and object of the trust. In this case the rule requires that the lands and other public property of the United States should be disposed of to the best advantage; and where that can be done by contributing a portion to works which would make the residue equally or more valuable than the whole would be without it, as is supposed, they hold it would be strictly within the rule. Your committee go further: They are of the opinion, not only that Congress has the right to contribute to the extent stated, in such cases, but that it is in duty bound to do so, as the representative of a part of the proprietors of the land to be benefited. It would be neither just nor fair for it to stand by and realize the advantage they would derive from this work without contributing a due proportion towards its construction. It would be still less justifiable to refuse to contribute, if its effect would be to defeat a work, the construction of which, while it would enhance the value of the land belonging to the public, and that of individual proprietors, would promote the prosperity of the country generally."

President Pierce, in his first annual message to Congress, 1853, said:

"Numerous applications have been, and no doubt will continue to be, made for grants of land in aid of the construction of railways. It is not believed to be within the intent and meaning of the Constitution that the power to dispose of the public domain should be used otherwise than might be expected from a prudent proprietor, and therefore, that grants of land to aid in the construction of roads should be restricted to cases where it would be for the interest of a proprietor, under like circumstances, thus to contribute to the construction of these works. For the practical operation of such grants, thus far, in advancing the interests of the States in which the works are located, and, at the same time, the substantial interests of all the other States, by enhancing the value and promoting the rapid sale of the public domain, I refer you to the report of the Secretary of the Interior. A careful examination, however, will show that this experience is the result of a just discrimination, and will be far from affording encouragement to a reckless or indiscriminate extension of the principle."

The Secretary of the Interior said:

"There can be as little doubt of the constitutionality of such grants as of their propriety.

"The right to donate a part for the enhancement of the value of the residue can no longer be justly questioned. The principle has been adopted and acted upon for nearly thirty years; and since experience has shown it to be productive of so much good, no sound reason is perceived why it should now be abandoned.

"It has been of incalculable importance to the great West, and either directly or indirectly to all the States."

The Commissioner of the General Land Office, in his report, 1853, said:

"The great and extraordinary increase in the amount of lands disposed of in sections of the country remote from each other, can only be accounted for by the improvements, aided by grants of alternate sections of land." "If no other reason existed this one, on the score of sound economy, would be sufficient. Many of these lands, however, have been in market long enough for the interest to amount to much more than the principle, and during all this period the States were deprived of the right and benefit of taxation." "To grants of this character for railroads," he continues, "not one tangible or substantial objection can be presented. The increased value given to the lands enables the Government to get double price and a ready sale for those retained, and hence the grant costs them nothing."

The power to "dispose of" the public lands exists. The exercise of this power is in the Government as proprietor, and although limited properly by the nature and restraints of the Constitution, the power, if employed at all, should be to insure the greatest advantage to the country.

Those who interpret the Constitution most largely, and contend for the right, under it, to carry on a general system of internal improvements, find no difficulty in these grants. Those who, like Mr. Calhoun, interpret strictly the terms of that instrument, deduce the power from the proprietary character of the Government. The difficulty is in the limitation of the power. But there are guards upon its exercise that do not exist in appropriations for internal improvement, both of time and locality. Time ceases when all the lands in a State are appropriated. The locality is determined in the designation by a State of the road chartered, and the confining of the grant by the Government to the vicinity of such roads.

of land have been thus granted.

It is proposed, by the amendment I have offered, to grant to the State of Louisiana, for the Vicksburg and Shreveport railroad, alternate sections of land on the same terms of the grants to these States.

If this bill passes, it will secure to that railroad about 729,600 acres.

A letter from the Commissioner of the Land Office, which I have just received, says:

"In regard to the lands along the Vicksburg and Shreveport railroad, I have to state, as follows:

The estimated quantity of land proposed to be granted is		729,600 acres.
The estimated vacant within six miles, on each side of the road is		422,400 "

"The average length of time these lands have been in market is twenty one years. About three quarters of the lands were offered between the years 1822 and 1843. The remaining one quarter—chiefly in the De Bastrop claim—is not yet offered. The graduated price of lands in market twenty one years would be fifty cents per acre.

"I am, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

"JOHN WILSON, Commissioner."

This, sir, is not a large demand. Reduced to dollars, it would be about $350,000. This is in the supposition that there remain sufficient vacant land within twelve miles of the line of the road to supply alternate sections for the grant. Within the last three months, however, a very large portion of these lands have been entered in anticipation of the construction of the road, and the fairer estimate would be that the lands to be conveyed by this bill do not value at more than $250,000. Louisiana has never yet had a grant of land for railroad purposes. All that she has ever asked for, is less than you have granted to the State of Illinois.

The States all around her have had such grants. They have been made to Alabama and Mississippi on the east; Arkansas and Missouri on the north. Texas on the west, has entire possession of all her lands. Why this distinction? Louisiana purchased after the adoption of the Constitution—from her history—the treaty stipulations of her cession; and her peculiar position, with the mouths of the Mississippi river within her borders, has certainly as great a claim upon the consideration of Congress. She brought with her to the Union, the free navigation of the Mississippi. She gave to the United States the commerce of the Gulf of Mexico; and opened the way to the Pacific coast. She has "contributed more," it has been well said, "than any other cause," to the growth and prosperity of the valley States east of the Mississippi, whose commerce has built up the cities, the commercial marine, the manufactures, the canals, and railroads of the States bordering on the Atlantic.

In return for all this, Louisiana, Mr. Speaker, has received but little from the Government. She has not, to be sure, been importunate in her demands, and I hope she never will be; but when she has a just claim upon the Government it should be acknowledged. The money paid into the Treasury for her lands, and collected on customs from her commerce, has been to her a dead loss of so much extracted from her wealth and disbursed in remote portions of the Union. She has been, in fact, like a mine, out of which treasure has been dug for the General Government

I have a remarkable table of receipts and expenditures by the Federal Government in Louisiana, to which I invite the attention of the House.

This statement exhibits the net proceeds, say $37,903,276 79 of the receipts of Louisiana from her admission into the Union in 1812 until 30th of June, 1853, after deducting every expenditure by the Federal Government within the State, as well as the appropriations to the Mississippi and its tributaries.

Mr. Speaker, the interest of Louisiana, particularly the portion of it that I represent, is agricultural.

The Mississippi river, flowing along the borders of the seven land States of Wisconsin, Iowa, Illinois, Indiana, Missouri, Arkansas, and Mississippi, passes through Louisiana with a western bank of more than six hundred miles, and an eastern one of more than four hundred, together, about one thousand miles.

The alluvial bottom along its course, that is but a narrow strip above Missouri, widens out with the waters of its lower tributaries into an immense basin of low land, that gives to Louisiana a gulf shore of several hundred miles all along the line of, and over and through which the waters of the great West reach the Gulf level.

This physical peculiarity has given to Louisiana an exceptional character of interest, connected with the land policy of the Federal Government, difficult to be appreciated by one who has not lived within her borders.

The fact that she has been under three different rules—Spanish, French and American—has complicated her land titles, and dotted her over with disputed grants and unadjusted claims, that in 1849 numbered 4,721,180 acres. Although organized as a Territory in 1804, and as a State in 1812, the first land office opened within her limits was in 1818, and such was the delay on the part of the General Government in surveying her lands, that of her (in round numbers) 29,000,000 acres of land, only 2,700,000 had, up to 1850, been surveyed.

In fact, sir, since her introduction into the Union, she has been like a captive fettered by the operation of your land system. For the whole of the original territory of Louisiana, beyond the Mississippi, extending north to the British possessions, and west to and over the Rocky mountains, you gave but $15,000.000. Years since you have been more than paid back this sum from the sale of lands, within but a small portion of this territory.

Amount of Moneys received for Lands sold in the undermentioned States up to January 1st, 1849, as per Statement of R. M. Young, Commissioner of the General Land Office, and as per Appendix to the Report of the Commissioner for the year 1848, page 255.

Every dollar you now realize from the sale of the remaining land in the State of Louisiana is in the nature of profits from a Government speculation.

I have once before, since I have been in this House, alluded to this subject, as a cause of just complaint. Mr. Benton said, in 1829, that the Federal Government had treated Louisiana worse with reference to her lands than she had been treated by the kings of France and Spain. His words were: "For all that the Federal Government has done, that State would now be a desert."

Mr. Livingston, in 1830, said "that in the twenty-five years she had been in the Union the Federal Government had retarded her just one half in her population;" and the Commissioner at the head of your General Land Office has said, "that it would have been cheaper for the original citizens of Louisiana to have purchased over again their lands from the General Government, than to have incurred the expense of the litigation to which they have been exposed in defending their titles."

I refer to these facts, Mr. Speaker, as showing, that aside from the peculiar merit of the present grant, Louisiana has claims of a general character upon the consideration of Congress.

Gentlemen may remind me of the swamp grant of near ten millions of acres, made to Louisiana at the time of similar grants to the other States, South and West.

This was, Mr. Speaker, to some of the States, in many respects a munificent grant. It was, as regards Louisiana, certainly a most just and proper grant. The Representative, [Mr. Harmanson,] who, by his active zeal, honorably attached his name to the legislation which secured it was from the congressional district of Louisiana I now represent. His untiring exertions in this behalf were gratefully appreciated at home.

But, sir, Louisiana has not yet been benefited by the grant to the same extent as the other States who were its recipients. It was a grant not only to reclaim land, but to secure from miasma and disease, a large region of country. Disease, which higher up the Mississippi river, strikes here and there an individual, has, in some instances in Louisiana, swept whole communities.

The object of the grant was to enable the State to do what the General Government could not so well do, remove, by a system of draining and leveeing, the causes of a miasma which, generated in swamps more than half the year covered with water, and protected by deep and thick forests from the sun, was borne by currents of wind, over the more elevated and healthy regions on each side. I have in my hand the report of the Board of Swamp Land Commissioners of Louisiana, addressed to the Governor of the State, January 2, 1854, with reference to these lands. From it I find, that in that year, two out of the three engineers engaged by the State in surveying this swamp land fell victims to disease. From the report for the present year it appears that the survey has been again delayed by reason of the ill health of those exposed in this duty.

The united report of the three commissioners of the State for the year 1854, says that the protection levees on the Mississippi river, with other rivers and bayous of the State, require such great expenditures that the lands available to that State may not produce more than sufficient to guard against overflow. And that the draining of the lands would not cost, for main drains, machinery and building, more than eight dollars per acre, or $72,000 for nine thousand acres.

This is the outlay calculated to be made by the State for "main drains" only. The smaller drains and clearings are not included in this estimate, and are to be performed when preparing for cultivation. One of these commissioners, an old and respected citizen of the State, (Colonel Van Winkle,) says, in his report to the Governor:

"It is now, with fear and trembling, that the citizens of our State witness the annual rise of the Mississippi, not knowing at what moment the labor of years may be swept away, and all their plans for the future dissipated."

The effect has been this: The water of the Mississippi river leveed out from the banks above, has been forced down upon Louisiana, in an increased volume, making it necessary to strengthen and build higher her levees, cut outlets, and make drains, resulting in the organization under scientific men, of a system of State internal drainage, attended with great expense, and entirely unknown in any other State of the Union. So great has been the expense entailed upon her by this means, that the Commissioner of the General Land Office, (Mr. Wilson,) than whom no one is better acquainted with the peculiarities of Louisiana swamp lands, recommended in 1852, as but an act of justice and propriety, the granting to her the remaining ten millions of acres of public land within her borders.

Under these circumstances, Mr. Speaker, I trust there will be no more allusion in this House to the grant of swamp lands to Louisiana as a gratuity. In no light can it be regarded as a gratuity. A great portion of the land comprehended in the grant has never yet been surveyed, by reason of their low and marshy character. Had the General Government received no other consideration, the enhanced value in the reclamation of large tracts of public land heretofore produced by private levees would be a full equivalent.

But, Mr. Speaker, I leave this general view of the subject, and ask the attention of the House, while I state, as briefly as possible, a few of the particular reasons in favor of the grant of lands under the bill now before the House.

1. The local peculiarities of the country to be traversed by the proposed railroad, are such as to make it greatly to the interest of the Government to grant alternate sections of land in order to give value to the remaining sections.

2. The national character of the road for which the grant is asked, and the terms of the bill under which it is to be conveyed, strongly recommend it to the favorable consideration of Congress.

3. The amount of land asked is so small, and, in its present inaccessible state, its value so little, that, even should this bill pass, nominally making a grant to the State, the Government in reality will have made a most profitable contract.

I believe that the land to be conveyed under this bill will be more than reimbursed in value to the Government, threefold.

1. By the increased value of the remaining sections of land along the route.

2. By the saving in the carrying of the United States mail.

3. By the saving in the transportation of its troops and military stores.

The Vicksburg and Shreveport railroad company's charter bears date the 5th July, 1852. The company was organized the 25th January, 1853.

The route from Vicksburg across to the Texas line has been surveyed. The distance is two hundred and ten miles. The State of Louisiana has subscribed for $800,000 of stock. Individuals living along the line, the parishes through which it passes, and persons living at the proposed termini, have liberally subscribed. Portions of the road are now under construction, and such is the deep interest felt that many of the planters along the route have contracted for portions of the work, to receive pay in stock.

In the entire distance across the State the road will vary only nine miles from a direct line. From Vicksburg, on the Mississippi river, it will pass directly west to Monroe, in Louisiana, a distance of seventy-five miles, and from Monroe to Shreveport, a distance of about one hundred miles, and from there to the Texas line west about thirty miles. The entire distance, in all, is about two hundred miles. The elevation in this distance will be only about fifty feet.

When completed, the immediate advantages of the road will be felt in the development of the interior regions of Arkansas, Texas, and Mississippi; while its connection with a system of roads to extend through Texas to the Pacific, will open a large avenue of rich trade. There is not, perhaps, a richer agricultural region in the world than portions of that through which the road will pass. It is intersected by marshy lakes, bayous, and small rivers seldom navigable. What Napoleon once called, on his return from his Russian campaign, a fifth element of nature in addition to earth, water, air, and fire, mud makes it impassable to ordinary roads. There are in it tracts of the finest cotton and sugar land in the world, lying entirely unproductive, islets, as it were, in a region of morass. The road will cross the triangle of land between the Mississippi and the Red river, bringing into market these lands, and connecting, as a link, the railroad going west, terminating at Vicksburg, with that coming east from Texas at Shreveport.

I hold in my hand a table, drawn from the last census returns, showing the extent, population, agricultural product, and wealth of the twelve parishes most nearly interested in the construction of this road.

Their production in 1851 was 138 bales of cotton and 2,000,000 bushels of corn, from the labor of 46,099 slaves. Their white population in 1850 was 33,392. I cannot be much in error in relying upon a calculation made by my colleague, [Judge JONES,] when I estimate the product of these parishes for 1853 to have been nearly 300,000 bales of cotton. Complete this railroad, and the increased facility to market will draw a dense population, and cause greatly increased production. I have here, sir, a remarkable table, to which I invite attention, as showing the difference in the expense of getting produce to market at the South by ordinary roads of the country and by railroad:

STATEMENT—

Showing the value of a ton of Cotton, say five bales of four hundred pounds each, at seven cents per pound, equal to $140 the ton, and one of sugar, say, two hogsheads, of one thousand pounds each, at three and a half per cent. per pound, equal to seventy dollars the ton—at given points from market, as effected by cost of transportation by railroad, and over the ordinary roads, computing the cost by railroad at three cents per ton, ten miles, and by the ordinary road, one dollar and a half per hundred for ten miles—the estimated average rates in the southern country by these two modes of conveyance:

These facts and figures are not given except to show that this application for land is not made in behalf of a small interest, or for the advantage of a few speculators.

If ever there was an application for a grant of lands for railroad purposes within a State that could with propriety be termed national in its character, this is certainly one. It is to connect the great chain of railroads which already exists, with one or two broken links from Charleston to Vicksburg, with that which is provided for in the magnificent grant by Texas to construct a road across her entire borders.

A region of country five times the size of the great State of New York, and much larger than the whole of New England, lies to the southwest of the Mississippi valley, all embraced within the single State of Texas. Its resources are yet undeveloped. In population and wealth it will exceed what New England now is. Without going beyond its limits we may, without any stretch of imagination, picture it to the other States of the South, and in its influence upon the Union what New England has been to the northern States and the Union. This region, once alien, now seeks to be bound yet closer by increased means of intercourse and trade with the Union.

Her gulf shores are shallow, and not always accessible to our large merchant vessels.

The Red river, her natural outlet to the Mississippi valley, is obstructed in its navigation by rafts and other causes, that make it, for almost six months in the year, entirely useless for trade. The small town of Shreveport, of only a dozen houses a few years since, has grown into a flourishing city, second only to New Orleans in population and wealth, of any in Louisiana. It has become so by being the stopping point of the wealth and trade of the West in its course East. Often the merchants of Texas, deterred by the sickness in the Gulf cities, from passing through them, on their way East for northern purchases, have been obliged to trust the uncertain and circuitous navigation of the Red river, or to force their way by land across north Louisiana, along the very line of this projected road. The emigration from the States east of the Mississippi, west over this line, and through Shreveport to Texas, is very great. It has been estimated, in some years, from sixty to one hundred thousand persons. When the water in Red river is low, the principal portion of it is through by land; and when high, by the river. It is not unusual at certain seasons (my colleague, Judge Jones, tells me) to see forty or fifty large traveling wagons together, on the eastern bank of the Red river, waiting their turn to cross the ferry toward Shreveport.

I will not enlarge upon the commercial advantages to result from the completion of this road. It will open a direct, valuable, and increasing demand for the manufactured articles of the middle and southern, as well as for those of the northern States. It will go far towards completing, almost on the same parallel of latitude, of thirty-two degrees, the longest line of railroad in the world, and passing through the richest agricultural region that exists. It will make comparatively easy the accomplishment by capitalists, even without the aid of Government, of railroad communication with the Pacific, and through a region embarrassed neither by the snows of winter, nor the excessive heats of summer. The fields where are grown the cotton and sugar of the world will be along its line. The gold mines of California and the trade of the Pacific will be at one end, and Cuba and that of the Atlantic near the other. The same trade that made the shores of the Mediterranean sea to bloom with civilization and built up large cities along its line, will pass directly through our borders. There can be no calculation of the effect upon the future of the South. New life and energy will be given to every interest. I forbear, however, to more than suggest a few of these national considerations.

I have said, Mr. Speaker, that the grant of alternate sections to this road would be, I believe, more than threefold repaid to the Government.

1. The value of the land granted is to be repaid by the sale of the remaining sections along the line, at double their present price. Experience shows that the Government has been (says the Commissioner of the General Land Office) fully reimbursed in this way for railroad grants heretofore made.

If there is any doubt, however, on this point in the mind of any one, I ask his attention to another aspect of this question. The amount of duty on iron which this company will pay into the public Treasury in constructing two hundred miles, will of itself pay more than the value of the lands. It is estimated that the present duty on every mile of railroad iron laid down, is over $1,200. This for two hundred miles would be $240,000 paid into the Treasury.

2. The present bill proposes that, first, the Postmaster General, and afterwards (if it sees proper) Congress, shall fix the amount at which the road, when constructed, shall carry the United States mail. The rates now paid railroads for single daily service vary from $50 to $150 a mile. If, as is most likely, the road should be directed to carry the mail for the least sum now paid, it will cause an annual saving to the Government of $100 a mile. This for the two hundred miles of the road will be $20,000. Thus by this means in a few years the Government will be reimbursed the value of its lands.

3. By the bill, the road, when constructed, will "remain a public highway for the use of the Government of the United States, free from toll or other charge upon the transportation of any property or troops of the United States." Under this section, in case of war with Mexico, the Government would be in one year more than repaid in the transportation of its troops, the full value of the lands proposed to be granted. That this may be perfectly plain, I call attention to House document No. 24, containing a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting reports in reference to obstructions to the navigation of the Red river, dated January 16, 1854, in which the Quartermaster Department reports to Colonel Davis, that in 1851 it was estimated "that if the raft in Red river were removed, so as to afford an unobstructed navigation to that river, it would result in a saving of about $4,500 for each company to be supplied or for a regiment about $45,000 annually."

The report says that from 1851 to 1854 the cost of transportation remained about the same.

General Jesup, in 1851, gave the data of this calculation, as follows:

On one hundred and thirty-two thousand one hundred and sixty pounds subsistence, at three cents per pound	$3,964 80
On five thousand pounds clothing and camp equipage, at three cents per pound	150 00
On ten thousand pounds quartermaster's ordnance, and medical stores, at three cents per pound	300 00
On twenty-eight enlisted men, at four dollars each,	112 00
Amount saved to a company	$4,526 80

There is at present one regiment (fifth infantry) which is to be supplied from Fort Smith, or by Red river; consequently, the saving to the Government, which would be made by the removal of the raft, may be estimated at $45,000 annually, provided a regiment of troops is to be maintained on that line of the frontier, and in proportion as the number may be decreased or increased.

The foregoing calculation is based upon the supposition that only the new posts ordered to be established by the fifth infantry are to be supplied by way of Red river; but, if that river should be effectually cleared out so as to render its navigation certain during the high stages of water, it is believed that at least two of the present posts in Texas, now occupied by other troops, could be more economically supplied than at present, by way of Indianola, on the coast; added to which, it is but fair to presume that, as the posts on the new line be pushed forward towards the Rio Grande, it will be found that that route will be cheaper and more certain for supplying the posts in the vicinity of El Paso, in New Mexico, than the present routes via Indianola or Fort Leavenworth.

It will be observed that this saving, of near $50,000, is the difference between what the Government now pays, and what it would have to pay for the transportation of troops and military stores, were the raft in the Red river removed. By the railroad, if constructed, with the aid of a grant of lands from the Government, its saving would be of nearly the entire amount now expended. It is not extravagant to estimate, therefore, that the Government would thus be more than paid back to the fullest in a few years the value of the lands donated.

Mr. Speaker, I will not refer to the injustice of individuals—small landed proprietors—paying taxes for the construction of railroads by which the General Government, the largest landed proprietor along the line, is to reap the greatest advantage in the enhanced value of its land, without itself paying even a cent in taxes. I have heretofore called to the attention of the House a calculation made in 1849, that from a forbearance to tax the land of the General Government, within their limits, the States have lost $72,000,000. I have now said, sir, all that I intend to say on this subject. My remarks apply, except where the Vicksburg and Shreveport railroad is mentioned, to all the other railroads in Louisiana for which land grants are asked.

I will not be tempted into anything that even by perversion can be construed into a sectional advocacy of the bill before the House. Louisiana will construct her roads, Mr. Speaker, whether you grant or refuse her the lands along their line. She has capital, energy, and intelligence united in the direction of these enterprises. She has never been, and I trust she never will be, an importunate beggar for grants of any kind from the Federal Government. If you deny her justice under the legislation of this House, she will, at least, preserve her self-respect. When the recent bill for the Pacific railroad was up for passage, under the rules of your House I could not protest against what seemed to me very much like an effort to shut her off from all the advantages of the Pacific road. I do not charge it as such an effort. I have too much respect for the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Davis] to believe that was the design; but, sir, coming from almost any other source, I would have believed it to have been such an effort. To the proposition to construct a great central road to the Pacific, with one northern branch running towards the great lakes, and the other, not, sir, towards the Gulf of Mexico, but towards Memphis, I did not move an amendment turning that southern branch towards New Orleans; for even then it would have been a virtual exclusion of both Texas and Louisiana from the advantages of the California trade.

My colleague [Judge Dunbar] offered the bill of the Senate, providing for a northern, a central, and a southern route. Could anything be more just? It was rejected. I then offered to the House a proposition prepared by the member from Arkansas, [Mr. Warren,] which I thought national and entirely just towards all sections. It was, that the Government should grant alternate sections of land for the construction of a railroad through its Territories, from any point west of the Mississippi river that individual enterprise and capital should select, with proper guarantees for its completion to the Pacific. To such a grant few entertain constitutional objections. President Pierce, in his first annual message, said:

"Congress, representing the proprietors of the territorial domain, and charged especially with power to dispose of territory belonging to the United States, has, for a long course of years, beginning with the Administration of Mr. Jefferson, exercised the power to construct roads within the Territories, and there are so many and obvious distinctions between this exercise of power and that of making roads within the States, that the former has never been considered subject to such objections as applied to the latter, and such may now be considered the settled construction of the power of the Federal Government on the subject."

Asking no monopoly, Mr. Speaker, by the Federal Government of this trade to herself, I know I speak the sentiment of Louisiana when I say she will not acquiesce without a sense of wrong done her in any legislation on the part of Congress which secures it to some other State further north. Natural advantages, capital, and individual enterprise should determine the route. Left to such a decision, I have no doubt where the railroad will run. I have material which, on this point, it seems to me, should satisfy every unprejudiced mind. To place it on record, and, at the same time, give it circulation, I will conclude my remarks by reading it:

Captain Marcy, in his report dated November 20, 1849, concludes by saying:

"From all I can learn of the other routes to California, I am induced to believe, that should our Government at any future time determine upon making a national road of any description across the continent, the southern route we have traveled is eminently worthy of consideration. We find upon none of the northern routes as much water, timber, or rich fertile soil, as upon this. There are many more mountains to pass over, and during a part of the year they are buried in deep snows.

Major H. H. Merrill, United States Army, writing from Austn, Texas, May 6, 1854, to Hon. Anson Jones, of that State, says:

"An active service of over five years in your State, most of which has been confined to her remote borders, has brought under my personal observation much of her country, and, I may say, quite all you refer to, and as lying east of the Rio Grande." "For grazing purposes there is, perhaps, not a finer country in the world." "The climate of this latitude is mild and beautiful all seasons of the year." "For general health it will compare with an equal extent of any country throughout the United States." "Nearly all the country along this route is susceptible of a dense population, composed generally of rich lands easily cultivated, well watered, and has an abundance of stone, with a due proportion of timber." "That the line of 32° is by far the cheapest and most practicable route for the Atlantic and Pacific railroad is, in my own mind, settled beyond a doubt. Possessing an easy grade, with ample stone, timber, and water, passing through a rich and beautiful country, with a climate not surpassed, if equaled, by any in the world, it cannot fail to attract the attention of all, and become the favorite route of the country. The very liberal donation of your State in granting twenty sections of her land, of six hundred and forty acres each, for every mile of road constructed on this route, I regard as ample for its entire construction within your limits."

For an interesting and concise statement with reference to the southern route, made by A. B. Gray, (not yet published,) late United States surveyor of the Mexican boundary, under the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo, I am indebted to General

RUSK, of Texas. I am assured every reliance can be placed upon its correctness:

Estimates, &c.

Assuming the distance from Lake Lodo, near Shreveport, on Red river, Louisiana, to the eastern bank of the Rio Grande, at El Paso, to be eight hundred miles by the route proposed in the vicinity of the parallel of 32° north latitude, the following estimate will not, I think, be far from the truth. It is, of course, only approximate, but, based upon a computation upon reliable data, and I believe that, with proper judgment and economy, and a faithful management of affairs, will be fully sufficient to complete the whole line from the eastern to the western limits of the State of Texas.

Approximate Estimate.

1st. 200 miles grading, $4,000	$800,000
2d. 200 miles grading, $3,500	700,000
3d. 200 miles grading, $4,500	900,000

Bridging, 800 miles, $1,500,000	1,500,000
		$9,900,000
		$14,100,000

Equipment.

Engines, passenger cars, freight and baggage cars	$5,000,000
Engine-houses, station-houses, water-stations	2,000,000
Right of way, engineering, and contingencies	6,000,000
Total for line in Texas	$27,100,000

I have shown that no impassable barriers exist between Texas and the Gulf of California; and should a railroad be built through Texas, nothing, in my opinion, can prevent its continuance to the Gulf and, likewise to the State of California.

A line west of El Paso for two hundred and fifty miles to a point in the neighborhood of the town of Tubac, (now in the United States, under the recent treaty with Mexico,) might be a common trunk to California, as well as to the Gulf. A railway to the latter I conceive would facilitate the construction of a road to the former.

I is less than five hundred miles from the Rio Grande to the Gulf, and two hundred and fifty of it being in common, would leave two hundred and fifty miles at most to build, and when finished would be the means of easy transportation for the heavy materials, necessary to the construction of the road to California.

Guaymas has a large and safe harbor, and accessible at all times. The geographical situation of the Gulf of California renders it certain that some place there must become important, and it holds a conspicuous position in connection with the speedy construction of the line to the Rio Grande.

The fine back country of Sonora, Chihuahua, and part of New Mexico, with its mineral and agricultural wealth, has its natural outlet upon that Gulf, and it only awaits a steady and liberal Government there to develop it as one of the most valuable districts upon the continent.

At the same rate of estimate as given for the line through the State of Texas, a railroad from the Rio Grande to the Gulf of California, would cost as follows:

Approximate Estimate.

1st. 200 miles from El Paso, grading, &c., $9,000		$1,800,000
2d. 200 miles from El Paso, grading, &c., $4,500		900,000
3d. 75 miles to the Gulf, $3,000		225,000
475 miles, at a cost of			$2,925,000
Ballasting 475 miles, $500		237,500
Ties, " 200		95,000
Iron, " 8,000		3,800,000
Bridging, " 700,000		700,000
			4,832,500

Equipment.

Engines, passenger cars, freight and baggage wagons	3,000,000
Engine-houses, station houses, water-stations, &c.	1,500,000
Right of way, engineering, and contingencies	4,000,000
Total	$16,257,500
Total cost of line west of Rio Grande	16,257,500
Total cost of line through Texas as per estimate	27,100,000
Total whole line from Mississippi waters to Gulf of California	43,357,500

The line through Texas, I believe, can be built in five years, and, upon its connection with the gulf, will at once be available to the China, Australian, and Pacific trade. To California, it will reduce the time from New York to ten days, besides aiding in the continuation of the road to that State.

The benefits to be derived from the construction of the railway along the parallel of 32° north latitude, in Texas, are not alone confined to that State. Incalculable as the advantages may be to her, still every State in this Union must be deeply interested in it, from the frontiers of Missouri to the State of Maine, and from the capes of Florida to Corpus Christi. From the Atlantic to the Pacific, I believe, it will be the great trunk from which, at the east, will branch lines to St. Louis, to New York, to Charleston, and New Orleans, and at the west will likewise branch to California and to Guaymas, or some other convenient point at the gulf.

From its perfect accessibility at all seasons of the year, free from the drifting snows of the north, and the malignant diseases of the tropics, this main trunk railway must command, to a great extent, the trade and commerce of the world.

The route through Texas, by way of El Paso, or Presidio del Norte, to the Gulf of California, would shorten the present mode of travel from England to Australia, by the Isthmus of Panama, at least seven days, by giving a connected line of railroad for two thousand five hundred miles, at the rate of from twenty to thirty miles the hour, whereas at present, by the Isthmus, there would be but eighty miles at that speed.

Were Galway, in Ireland, a packet station, it is shown at a railway convention, that the time of travel between the two great cities of New York and London could be shortened by four days, or four days and a half.

Thus the transportation of the mails and passengers, the $40,000,000 specie annually, and the expresses to and from Australia and the South Pacific, at least, would be forced (by the saving of such vast interest) to follow this route. Add to this the mails, passengers, express packages, specie, and manufactured articles that would necessarily be transported by a railway to and from California and the North Pacific, and enormous returns upon the outlay of capital invested in its construction and maintenance would be the result.

The local trade, likewise, that this road would command is of no little consideration, but of itself, in my opinion, would very shortly pay well. The whole valley of the Rio Grande, from Santa Fé to Presidio del Norte, the extensive interior of Sonora, Chihuahua, New Mexico, and Texas, would be subservient to it.

RECAPITULATION.

The length of this line from Eastern Texas to the Gulf of California would be 1,275 miles.

Heaviest grades 67 feet per mile for seventeen (17) miles.

Whole distance through Texas eight hundred miles, (800.)

Heaviest grade 66 feet, (around Guadalupe mountains,) which can be avoided by lengthening the line some ten miles.

Settlements extend for 450 miles westward in Texas.

Three hundred and fifty (350) miles to the Rio Grande at present no settlements.

From Rio Grande to the Gulf of California, near Alta, settlements within fifty (50) miles of the route, all the way except for one hundred and fifty (150) miles.

No desert is encountered on this line, water sufficient for all purposes, and no swamps.

Timber for the first four hundred and fifty (450) miles in abundance.

For the second four hundred (400) miles, cotton wood and pine with some post oak, will have to be transported at distances of fifty and seventy-five (50 and 75) miles only.

Two hundred miles west Rio Grande, (200 miles,) no point over (60) sixty miles without timber; and for three hundred (300) miles, plenty at convenient distances.

Climate.—Climate salubrious throughout, admitting of labor on the road at all seasons.

The greater proportion of country along this line, capable of the highest state of cultivation, and the minerals and metals, that will bear transportation upon it, and found in its neighborhood, are coal, iron, copper, lead, silver, and gold.

In concluding this hastily written statement to accompany the profile of the line of my reconnoissance, I would remark that I am much indebted to my friend, W. J. McAlpine, Esq., late State engineer of New York, for important memoranda for estimates, &c., which much facilitated my computations.

I have the honor to be, sir, very respectfully yours,

A. B. GRAY.

KNOW-NOTHINGISM.

SPEECH OF HON. THOS. RUFFIN,

OF NORTH CAROLINA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

February 27, 1855.

The House being in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union—

Mr. RUFFIN said:

MR. CHAIRMAN: I rise in my place for the first time since I have had a seat upon this floor, with the view of submitting a few remarks. I do not propose to discuss the question immediately before the committee, and shall avail myself of the privilege now accorded me, to consider another question. Since I have been a member of this House, it has acted upon many important questions. Being loth to trespass upon the time of the House, I have contented myself by giving a silent vote upon all of them. These were questions which had heretofore entered, more or less, into the political discussions of our country, and upon them my opinions were not unknown to my constituents. Since the commencement of the present session of Congress we have heard discussions in this Hall upon questions which were thought to have been settled long ago. I allude more particularly to those great questions of religious toleration and naturalization.

I had thought that the question of religious toleration was settled by the Constitution of the country, and that American citizens had always proudly boasted that here every man had the right to worship Almighty God according to the dictates of his own conscience, and that this right was not only guarantied by the fundamental law of the land, but was regarded as inherent and inalienable. And, Mr. Chairman, I had thought that the naturalization laws passed under the administration of Jefferson, amended and perfected by subsequent legislation, had given general satisfaction to the country, with the exception of a small faction. Throughout the country discussion on these questions has been revived of late.

To keep pace with the spirit of the times, early in the present session honorable gentlemen were struggling to get the floor to bring them before the House for its consideration. The honorable gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. TAYLOR,] more fortunate than his competitors, succeeded in his efforts, and, having obtained the floor, introduced a bill proposing an alteration of the naturalization laws. Sir, that gentleman is responsible for the introduction of the subject here, or, if he prefers it, he is entitled to the distinguished honor of having been the first to introduce this measure into the House at the present session of Congress.

And again, sir, not long since a series of resolutions embodying certain principles in relation to these questions was offered by the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. WITTE.] I was called upon to vote for the suspension of the rules to enable the House to consider those resolutions; and it is not out of place here that I should give the reasons which influenced me in giving the vote which I gave on that occasion. These are generally known as the anti-Know-Nothing resolutions.

I can conceive of no evil, either real, or imaginary, existing or supposed to exist in this country, which will justify American freemen in the formation of secret oath-bound political societies. They may do for the despotism of Russia; they may do for Austria; but there can certainly be no necessity for such in our land.

No, sir; in our country, where every man has the right to speak, print, and publish whatever he may see fit, only being liable for the abuse of that privilege, and where, to use the language of an old revolutionary writer, "The press glows with freedom's sacred zeal,"—here, sir, there can be no necessity for resorting to institutions of this kind with a view of controlling the legislation of the country. Those who framed our Government wisely provided the means of altering such laws as needed amendment. They are open to repeal or alteration; but, sir, this can be done through the ballot-box, in the sunlight of broad day. Our institutions depend, for their success, on the virtue, intelligence, and patriotism of the people; and when the time comes in which they will desert the usual mode, do away with the open action of day, and resort to these secret cabals to influence the legislation of the country, then, in my opinion, the days of the Republic are numbered. He has read history with but little profit, who has not observed that in every country where the people have lost their liberties they have brought such misfortune upon themselves. When they have become demoralized and ready for a change, then the turmoil of the times has given birth to some adventurer who boldly usurps their liberties, assumes the management of their affairs, and concentrates all political power in himself. Learning lessons of wisdom from the records of the past, let us strive to escape the calamities that have befallen other Republican Governments.

What master-spirit devised this organization? I do not know that this is a question of any great importance. I do not think that the author is entitled to any great credit for originality; I do not undertake to say whether it is taken from the forms and ceremonies adopted by Cataline and his co-conspirators at Rome, or whether it is like unto the societies formed in certain districts of England to protect labor against capital, or whether, as seems most probable, it has for its prototype the order of religious Jesuits, as depicted in the "Wandering Jew," and that the Federal Treasury is the Renepont inheritance, which it is using its appliances and secret machinery to get possession of.

I was forcibly struck with the similarity between the two orders—the religious Jesuits and the Know-Nothings—in the speech of the honorable gentleman from Alabama, [Mr. Smith,] and I am sorry that he is not present this evening. From his graphic descriptions in the defense of the Know-Nothing order, we see that it makes use of the same appliances to accomplish its objects as the religious Jesuits, which order he set out to denounce. In one portion of his speech he says that the Know-Nothings are formed for the purpose of making war against the religious Jesuits. Both seem to be the same in organization. Each is after power and spoils. Each is enshrouded in the garb of mystery. One hides its iniquities under the cloak of religion, the other under a most exalted devotion to country. Each teaches the practice of falsehood, craft and deceit. Each binds its members by a mighty oath, the violation of which they assume to punish. The one claims devout piety, the other intense patriotism.

The gentleman from Alabama says, that "when you fight the devil you have the right to fight him with fire." That seems to be in fact an acknowledgment on his part that the new order was taken from the other one. But will this principle hold good? Fight the devil with fire; perpetrate an evil to obviate the consequences of another one; commit one fraud to nullify another! The gentleman is a distinguished lawyer, and I would ask him whether he would consider it right to meet a forged bond with a forged release? The principle is the same. That was said to have been a practice at one time quite common among the British lawyers in the East Indies. It has never been introduced into this country, and I trust that it never will be. It is unsound in morals. It is a sentiment unfit to be proclaimed in the presence of the Representatives of the people here in this Hall. He also says, in the course of his speech, that these religious Jesuits were organized by thwarted military aspirants after the reformation. I would ask whether this order of political Jesuits, of which the gentleman is champion upon this floor, was not organized after the great political revolution which swept Federalism out of power in 1852. Until this power was ground down, until Democracy was in the ascendency we never heard of any such order as this.

But to go on with the simile. The gentleman says that these religious Jesuits were taught to ingratiate themselves into the confidence of men of power and influence, or, to use his own language, "to cultivate their friendship, probe their designs, and communicate their secrets." How stands the order that he defends? Is it not well known to gentlemen on this floor who were candidates in the late elections for Congress, that these Know-Nothings formed this plan; pretended to be their friends, went into convention pretending to be Democrats, assisted in making the nominations, drew their secrets and all their plans from them, obtained all the information they could from them, and after nightfall skulked into the Know-Nothing lodges and communicated those secrets! This is a notorious fact, and cannot be denied. I say, that it is beneath the dignity of American gentlemen and honorable men to resort to such means in midnight lodges for any purpose. Do we not know that they make it a boast in Pennsylvania that, in the gubernatorial election there, they took the distinguished Democratic candidate, Governor Bigler, from one county to another, and his pretended friends of one lodge handed him over (if I may use the expression) to the tender care of his professed friends of another lodge, who would take him in special charge, and, in the language of the gentleman from Alabama, "cultivate his friendship, probe his designs, and communicate his secrets." Sir, this indicated a degree of proficiency in Jesuitism that would have gladdened the heart and raised a ghastly smile even on the countenance of old Rodin himself. [Laughter.]

The gentleman from Alabama justifies the oaths of this order, and says that it finds its justification in the practices of its adversaries. Is not that sound doctrine to hold forth in an American Congress? Finds its justification in the practices of its adversaries! The religious Jesuits are the adversaries he speaks of.

The gentleman says, also, that "an oath solemnly taken is an element of purity." Well, sir, if a solemn oath was what they sought for, this order should not have stopped at the oath of the Jesuits, but gone a few centuries further back and adopted the oath which Cataline administered to his co conspirators when they met in the back room of the house of one Sempronia, a Roman bawd—in a place, as the historian says, every way suited for the purpose, and well adapted to their occult and dark practices, for there, after administering a mighty oath, just as the Know-Nothings administer it, they sealed that oath by drinking from bowls draughts of wine mingled with human blood! Was that an element of purity? Did that oath make them pure? Why, sir, if the history of those times are correct, they were men of desperate fortunes and abandoned characters, men dangling loose upon society, who were ready for any change of affairs that promised to benefit themselves.

Then, sir, the gentleman says that secrecy is the great element of success, and that the "order should preserve in their halls the most inviolable secrecy," all the time acting upon the old doctrine that the end will justify the means. Now, sir, if this is not Jesuitism, I do not understand what is the meaning of the term. But the gentleman says that it finds its great justification of secrecy in the fact that it is warring against Jesuits. Warring against Jesuits! If the religious Jesuits are what the gentleman represents them to be, and if these political Jesuits of Know-Nothingism are what I believe them to be, I, sir, should look upon a contest between them with perfect indifference. I would look upon it as American citizens now generally look upon the war going on between Russia and the allied Powers, or as a western hunter would look upon a fight between a bear and an alligator, or a mink and a polecat. [Much laughter.] Every objection that the gentleman has urged against the Jesuits seems to apply with equal force to the Know-Nothings. They are neither of them suited to our country, and they cannot flourish here. One is the counterpart of the other, and sir, as my friend from the Red river district of Louisiana [Mr. Roland Jones] says, that the men of my State are fond of making quotations from Hudibras; let me say to the gentleman from Alabama, of the Know-Nothings and Jesuits, that:

> "They are so near akin,
> And like in all as well as sin,
> That put them in a bag and shake 'em,
> Himself on the sudden would mistake 'em,
> And not know which was which, unless
> He measured by their wickedness." [Laughter.]

Who set on foot the organization in the United States? We first find it springing up in the North, in the old hot-bed of Federalism. It had been conquered under every name by the Democratic party. It was the old Federal party, and was conquered under that name. It assumed the name of National Republican, then Whig, and then degenerated into isms. The Whig party had become almost extinct at the North. There was in fact but one party there, and that was the Democratic party. All the others were but isms.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. Will the gentleman tell me in which State at the North the Democratic party now exists?

Mr. RUFFIN. I think it does in Illinois, judging from the late election there. [Laughter.]

Mr. WASHBURNE. I suppose the gentleman refers to the election of an anti-Nebraska Senator? [Renewed laughter.]

Mr. RUFFIN. No, sir; I do not; but I will come to his election by and by.

Mr. FLORENCE. I will say to the gentleman, that it exists in Pennsylvania, thank God!—"its banner torn, but flying." [Great laughter.]

Mr. WASHBURNE. In what part of Pennsylvania?

Mr. FLORENCE. In the first congressional district. [Renewed laughter.] That will do. Now let the gentleman from North Carolina go on.

Mr. RUFFIN. The Democratic party being triumphant at the North, there was a fusion of all the isms to oppose it. This organization sprang up. It offered great inducements. There were a host of old political hacks out of office, men who had lived all their lives out of the public crib. They had then nothing to resort to. The Democratic party was in power in the General Government, at that time, and in most of the States, and these old political hacks, who were wandering about like stray spirits on the Stygian banks, thought it a fine chance to join in a new venture, and they joined this organization. I say, sir, that it is taken from the old Federal party. That party has never been eradicated at the North. It is true, the old tree of Federalism is dead, its leaves have long since withered and been wafted away upon the winds of Heaven, its boughs have crumbled and fallen, and its aged trunk lying prostrate has mouldered into dust, but from its prolific roots has sprung up this bastard slip of Know-Nothingism. It has incorporated into its platform planks from that old party.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Amen! [Laughter.]

Mr. RUFFIN. Anti-naturalization! Where is that taken from? It is a plank of the black cockade of Federalism of the days of the elder Adams, and the order finds a bright example of secresy in the blue-light Federalists who met in the Hartford Convention to plot treason against the Government. It has flourished in that section of country fruitful in isms—in Abolitionism, Free-Soilism, Atheism, Women's-rightism, and every other ism imaginable. These, sir, have given it its strength there, in that section of our country where men meet together in convention and declare "there is no God;" where agrarian mobs, the very scum of the earth, parade the streets by thousands, recognizing no distinction between meum and tuum, and crying aloud for a division of property—in that section of country, where weak-minded men, crazy fanatics, meet in convention with strong-minded women, clothed in boots and breeches, to discuss the important question of women's rights. [Laughter.]

Inaugurated under these auspices, how can this order be conservative? The idea is preposterous. It professes now to be the only true national conservative Union party; whereas it is a sectional radical destructive party. It is an Abolition, disunion scheme, and in every step, in its progress gives unerring indication of a settled purpose to sever asunder the ties which bind these States together. It has given strength to the Abolitionists of the North, and now it has the unblushing effrontery and daring impudence to offer itself to the South as something which is conservative, something which is designed to place in their hands, and the hands of their friends, the power of the General and State Governments. Sir, I, for one, never had any confidence in it from the beginning, for it came from the wrong quarter.

> "Timeo Danaos et dona ferentes."

I was satisfied that within the cavity of that wooden horse were concealed the elements of Abolitionism. It was absurd to believe that the Abolitionists of the North, when they had for years and years, in their weakness, waged an offensive war against the South, would now, in the pride of their strength, after their shattered ranks had been recruited by untold thousands, after the embattled hosts of Know-Nothingism had flocked to their standards, not in straggling parties like deserters, but in solid column, with flags flying and drums beating—be so magnanimous as to raise the long siege, and celebrate it with a peace offering. I for one, sir, as a southern man, cannot trust it. Was I not right, sir, in my opinion at that time? I say that I was. Recent developments have proved this beyond all doubt. The Know-Nothing party of the North has never aided in the election of a single friend of the Nebraska bill to either House of the Congress of the United States. I again assert that it has not. I challenge successful contradiction from any quarter, and pause for a reply. They have elected no man who is willing to give the South the rights guaranteed to it by the Constitution of the United States. Maine, Pennsylvania, New York, Ohio, Indiana, Iowa and Wisconsin have returned to this House men who are pledged to vote for the repeal of the fugitive slave law, which we regard as the very bond which binds the Union together. In the above named States it has aided Abolitionism in striking down the true friends of the Constitution, and filling their places with a dangerous class of politicians. Let us see what a northern editor says about its doings in the North:

"But if we lacked positive proof of the feelings of the masses of the party in regard to slavery, the late elections in this and other States of the Union show the liberal tendencies of the whole party. In New York the American party polled one hundred and twenty-two thousand votes, but they aided the anti-Nebraska party in that State in returning to the next Congress twenty-nine men opposed to the admission of slavery into Kansas. In Pennsylvania we saw a like result; while in Illinois, by the aid of this movement, the Douglasites were completely routed: and so in Michigan, where the whole State was carried for freedom by the council-fires of the American party."

But, sir, we are sometimes pointed by southern Know-Nothings to the Massachusetts election, and gravely told that the Know-Nothings in that State have sent a new delegation to Congress with but two exceptions. I am not aware of any alteration in this respect, so far as liberality and nationality are concerned. No, sir, these Yankees of Massachusetts are cunning men, and they follow the example of the skillful huntsman who, when his hounds are flagging in the chase, blows them off, lets slip the leashes and hies on a fresh pack, the more speedily to hunt down his prey. The people of Massachusetts no doubt thought that their Representatives here, being removed from the fanaticism which surrounds them at home, had become less zealous, and were rather flagging in the chase, and therefore considered it better to send on a new set. [Laughter.]

But, sir, if anybody has doubted this Abolition sentiment of Know-Nothingism, let us look at the recent elections carried by these Know-Nothings. Look at the men elected by them—Harlan, the fusionist in Iowa: Trumbull, the man of "isms," in Illinois, over the gallant Shields, whose body is scarred with wounds received in defense of the flag of his adopted country: Durkee, the Abolition agrarian in Wisconsin: Wilson, the embodiment of rampant Free-Soilism in Massachusetts, the latter elected by a Legislature in which there was but one Democrat; and, it is said, but some five or six old-line Whigs. Are the Know-Nothings not responsible for the election of these men? Are they not responsible for the election of this Mr. Wilson to the Senate of the United States? Yet another election! that of Seward, the "Jupiter Tonans" of abolition, the "higher law" Senator, who in the intensity of his hatred of the South, stands a head and shoulders above them all. The Know-Nothings had made a boast that they would defeat him; that they would show their nationality in that election; that they were going to take the arch-agitator from the Senate of the United States, and put a conservative in his place. That election was looked to with probably more interest than any senatorial election ever held in any of the States of this Union. We all recollect Tuesday, the 6th of February—I believe that was the day. It was, at all events, a dark and gloomy day. It was known that the election for United States Senator from New York was to be held that day in Albany. The hour had arrived. The telegraphic office in this capital was, on that occasion, an interesting place. Numbers of politicians might be seen wending their way there—your southern Know-Nothings, and your northern Know-Nothings. They were there about the time when they expected the announcement to come. They were watching with straining eyes, and palpitating hearts, and half-suppressed respiration. The mystic wire is watched with the fixed gaze of intense anxiety. A message comes rushing upon the wings of the lightning. The suspense is but short. "The sybil speaks, the dream is o'er." The dispatch is read. It was a sweet morsel to your free-soil Know-Nothings. They hearkened to it as the prodigal son to his father's testament. They gulped it down with all imaginable avidity. It was as sweet to them as the manna from Heaven to the hungry Israelites in the wilderness. But how was it to the southern Know-Nothings? Ah! it was a bitter pill for them. They had to swallow it down; but oh! what rueful grimaces and contortions of countenance; it was like gall and wormwood to a sick and fainting girl.

Now, sir, let us see what is thought of Seward as a national man in the North. I read an extract from one of the New York journals. I do not know whether it is Know-Nothing or not, but I suppose it is, at all events it was allied with them in the grand contest. Speaking of the Senator from New York, it says:

"He has pressed with equal ardor the claims of commerce, agriculture, and manufactures. He has vindicated with equal zeal, the just rights and interests of the West and South, and those of the East and of the North. There is not in this day, in the Senate or in public life, a statesman of more ability—more laborious and conscientious in his discharge of public duties, or more thoroughly and truly national in all his views, than Governor Seward."

And again, what a Know-Nothing journal means by conservatism:

"The slavery question cannot affect the American party for its whole power and all its hopes are north of Mason and Dixon's line. Its aspirations are for freedom, and when the party is accused of being pro-slavery, let its defenders point the men who uttered the base lie to every election that has occurred since the party sprung into existence."

Also, what is meant by "ignoring slavery:"

"The party never has, and we hope never will, fulminate anti-slavery resolves for the purpose of humbugging the masses, but it will do right, move right, and act right, and in every free State in the Union it will give new protection to every citizen within its borders. Its first great national aim is to procure an alteration of the naturalization laws; and upon that point they will know no sectional division; but upon the great question of freedom and slavery every northern American freeman will raise his voice for liberty, and Banks, De Witt, and Truffon will utter upon the floor of Congress the sentiments of this new party. That foreign element that has given the pro-slavery Democratic party the control of this country will soon lose the means of augmenting its numbers; and when that is effected freedom in this Republic is secure. The prize we are battling for is 'liberty to all;' and when Americans rule America we shall obtain it, and not till then."

Thus, we learn what is meant by their "ad captandum" expressions. Conservative indeed! "Lucus a non lucendo"—Called conservative for the same reason that a certain mythological character was called Midas, from a Greek word meaning to eat, because he could not eat. What can southern men promise themselves by affiliating with this "order?" If the people of the South act with their usual foresight, they will fly from it as from a raging pestilence, and shun a "Know-Nothing" lodge room as they would the charnel-house of a small-pox hospital.

I have thought from the beginning of this new movement that it was an emanation from the filth and corruption of rotten and festering isms, and that it was a mere ignis fatuus, fetid miasma springing up from moral and political decay, corruscating and shining in the darkest hour of night, but disappearing before the light of morn. It is not to be expected that the people of the South are to be blinded and led by this jack with a lantern into the bogs and marshes of Abolitionism; nor will they follow Sam with his dark-lantern into the midnight conclave of the Know-Nothings. But they tell us that these men are native Americans, and that we are not to suspect them. Is it not true that much the larger portion of the Abolitionists of this country are native-born Americans? Some of the leading spirits who figure in this Know-Nothing party are foreigners, although the party itself profess such a holy horror for all foreigners. The Crusader, a Know-Nothing paper at New York, is edited by one Caselli, and has for its chief contributor Father Gavazzi. It would require but little credulity for one to infer from the columns of the New York Herald, that a leading spirit in the councils of the order might be found in its editor. Bennett, an unnaturalized foreigner, and a political Ishmaelite, whose hand has been against every man, and every man's hand against him, has probably done more towards furthering the progress of this order, than any man in the United States. History will record two remarkable things of this order: one is, that, professing to be composed entirely of native Americans, its chief pillars of support are foreigners; and the other is, that it is a society of political Jesuits, professedly formed for the purpose of waging war against religious Jesuits.

The friends of the "order" say that it is necessary to establish their secret societies to protect ourselves against foreign influence. In the section of the country in which I live, we have none of this foreign influence, and we are not troubled with anything of the kind. What foreigners we have among us are generally intelligent and educated people, men of character, and I suppose one reason of it is owing to the fact of the existence of the "peculiar institution" among us, which I regard as one of the greatest moral, social, and political blessings that was ever vouchsafed to man, and another reason is owing to the fact that we have not encouraged these men to come as they have in some of the northern States where they are now complaining of them so much. Why, do we not know that two or three years ago the people of some of the northern cities regarded foreign fiddlers and show-girls as beings worthy of adoration, almost of worship; their coming from the other side of the Atlantic was of itself a certain passport to the highest honors. We all recollect with what exultation it was heralded through the land when the "Swedish Nightingale" touched the American shores. No one has forgotten the grand demonstration that was made in the great commercial emporium of New York; when the literati, the elite, aristocracy, and upper-tendom of that city flocked in her train in greater numbers than ever the Pagans followed after the car of Juggernaut. It was but a few years ago that they introduced at the North, a member of the British Parliament, to lecture upon the subject of Abolitionism. The people of the North are alone responsible for the introduction into this country that class of turbulent and vicious foreigners of whom they now complain so loudly.

Here, sir, I will say, that I am as much opposed as any man can be, to the introduction into this country of the vagabonds, felons, paupers, and convicts of the Old World. I say, let the Government pass such laws as it has authority and power to do under the Constitution, let the States and your municipal corporations pass such laws as they please, to suppress the introduction of this class of foreigners; but do not persecute the well-disposed foreigners on this account. You will find it no easy matter to stop the importation of convicts and paupers; and when you try it, you will ascertain that it will be something like the slave trade. Mercenary men will fit out vessels in the port of New York to bring convicts and paupers of Europe to this country, as they now fit out slavers to sail to the coast of Africa to get slaves for the markets of Brazil and Cuba. I do not care what kind of laws you pass against the importation of felons and convicts, you will find Yankee captains visiting the ports of Europe, and having their agents in its cities to contract secretly with the public authorities to rid them of their convicts and vagabonds by bringing them to our seaports—the more risk the higher will be the price of passage, and a brisk trade will soon be "opened up" by these enterprising men. You may have laws upon your statute book, for punishing in the severest manner those who engage in the importation of foreign criminals. You may for what I care, if you can find warrant for it in the Constitution, put this importation of felons on the same footing with piracy—you may take the vessels of the Navy and scour the high seas in search of the violaters of the law—you may, whenever you find a "live cargo" of criminals on board a ship, string up your Yankee skipper to the yard-arm, and pitch his body to the fishes of the sea. Even then, sir, I fear it will be difficult to stop the importation. Sir, there are now men at the North who have grown rich by the importation of this class of foreigners. Punish those who engage in it. Do not adopt the plan recently proposed by the philosopher, Horace Greeley. That amounts, in substance, to reducing the poor class of foreigners to slavery; and if it is carried out, New York will become a great slave-market—white men will be sold at the block.

I am opposed to making slaves out of any class of white men on earth. I know of no good reason for prohibiting the immigration of well-disposed foreigners to this country, to assist in developing its resources. A large portion of the foreigners in the West are German farmers, and they are known to be good citizens. I, for one, can see no reason why an orderly and well-disposed class of our population should be persecuted because mercenary men in the commercial cities will violate the rules of decency and propriety by bringing a different class of foreigners here. Enforce your naturalization laws. We hear a great deal said about its having been always customary to naturalize any man who desired to be naturalized. In that part of the Union in which I reside, I rejoice to say that the naturalization laws of the Federal Government are enforced to the very letter—just as strictly as any law we have upon the statute-book of our State. If you will impeach your judges when they violate their duty, and make them enforce the law, we can then have none but a good class of naturalized citizens, and no man, unless he proves a good character, and is well disposed to our institutions, &c., can get his naturalization papers. I do not understand this sudden change of opinion in regard to foreigners. Twelve months ago, the case of Martin Koszta was before this House, and gentlemen then seemed to be exceedingly anxious to curry favor with foreigners. Why this sudden change? Is it because military companies, composed of naturalized citizens, stood in serried ranks in Boston, to maintain the laws, and protect the officers of the Government in discharge of their duties, when a southern man was there seeking to claim his property under the Constitution? Is it because these naturalized Irishmen prevented a bloodthirsty mob of native-born traitors from rescuing a fugitive slave? Is is because Bachelder, who was assassinated by that mob, was a native of Ireland? Yes, Mr. Chairman, because these men kept off Abolition traitors, we hear this cry against them. The fact is notorious that one of the first acts of the present Know-Nothing Governor of Massachusetts was to disband these military companies. I suppose another reason for the outcry against foreigners is because they generally vote the Democratic ticket. In the last presidential canvass the Whig candidate proclaimed a new principle on this subject. He was for admitting to the rights of citizenship all who had served in the Army for a certain length of time, and but a short time at that. The Whigs then said he was right—they then said that service for a few months in camp—(the last place to learn the operation of our institutions)—should entitle a foreigner to citizenship. Such of them as have joined this "new movement," now say, let no one who is born abroad ever be naturalized. Yes, sir, it is because they cannot get the sturdy Germans and generous Irish to sing the peans of Federalism, that they are prejudiced against them. The ways of Federalism are the ways of inconsistency; before an important election it has a high appreciation of adopted citizens—it is then greatly fascinated with the "rich Irish brogue, and the sweet German accent," but the election over, and how is it then? Why, Paddy becomes a "splay-footed Irish bog trotter," and Hans a "damned lop-eared Dutchman." [Laughter.] Why are efforts now made to raise a party opposed to religious toleration?

And here, sir, I must be permitted to say that I have no relation or connection, so far as I know, either among the living or the dead, who ever was a member of any Catholic church; and while I yield to no man in the ardent and sincere hope that the day will come when the Protestant religion shall have its churches and altars in every part of the globe, yet, sir, I do not believe that either the fostering hand of the Government, or a persecution of other churches, would expedite its onward progress. I never will join in persecuting any man for his religious opinions. That is a matter between him and his God. In the part of the country in which I live, and I dare say in the whole State which I have the honor, in part, to represent, there is not a master who would dictate to his slave the manner in which he shall worship God, or the church to which he shall belong. This new-fangled doctrine of the Know-Nothings to hunt down men on account of their religious opinions, is a monstrous proposition. It is at utter variance with the whole spirit of our Government.

And where did this proscription against the Catholic religion originate? It originated in the same section of the country, at the North, where those three thousand and fifty Abolition clergymen got up a traitorous petition to the Congress of the United States. No Catholics joined them. No Catholic signed that petition. But, sir, this seems to be an effort either to make them join the Abolition party, and engage in an Abolition crusade against the South, or that they will drive them from the country by persecution. Opposition to this religion is held out to us of the South as the reason why we should join this "Know-Nothing" order. As the Catholics do not wage a war against us, I, for one, am opposed to waging war against them. As long as they obey the Constitution and the laws, their rights should be respected by every man. It is a deep laid scheme, all these ghost tales, cock-and-bull stories, and old wives' fables about the Jesuits and Catholics of the United States. All designed to operate on the prejudices of the people. They expect them to operate as a charm upon the South, and in that way to throw us off our guard. We have much stronger reasons for apprehending danger from the machinations of the three thousand and fifty woolly-headed Abolition clergymen who, with the wierd sanctity of bigotry and fanaticism, are disseminating treason from their pulpits, than from the tiara that encircles the brow of the feeble and harmless old man at Rome, thousands and thousands of leagues by land and sea, far, far away from our shores.

But, sir, in this connection let us see what is going on in New England. A newspaper has this advertisement:

"SLAVERY AND POPERY.—Rev. Thomas James, a fugitive slave, will address the citizens of various towns upon Slavery and Popery, and show their bearing on the nation."

And then follows a list of appointments. If a southern minister should desire to preach from one of their pulpits the privilege would be denied him; yet this negro can use them.

I have seen it stated frequently in the papers, that in the great State of New York free negroes had actually formed Know-Nothing lodges. This is the conservative party which the people of the South are invited to join, so as to war against the Pope. Sir, we have enemies, a plenty at our own doors, without looking across the waters to find others. How is it proposed to sustain the Know-Nothing party? By boasting and threats. The gentleman from Maryland [Mr. SOLLERS] would have us believe that this party is one of gigantic power, and that he who has any hopes of a political future should not be so rash as to combat it. He says, "it has gone sweeping like a whirlwind" and "annihilating all its opponents." He appeals to the fears of gentlemen, and talks to them of political graves—let him take heed lest when looking around for burial places for others, he shall himself be consigned to a political grave as deep as the "gloom where dreary chaos reigns," and where he may be even beyond the reach of that politico geological explorer of whom he spoke, who, at some future day, is to search for the opponents of Know-Nothingism among the fossil remains of an extinct race. I, sir, tender my thanks to the eloquent gentlemen from Mississippi and South Carolina [Mr. BARRY and Mr. KEITT] for their exposition of the objects and aims of the Know-Nothings, and for their moral courage in being first on this floor to assail the principles of this new order. With keen blades and stalwart blows they shivered into fragments the crazy mail that but feebly protected this staggering carcass of galvanized Federalism, and exhibited it in its nakedness and hideous deformity to the gaze of the world. The order had not then so fully developed its anti-slavery sentiment. The gentleman claimed for it "intense nationality." We were to hear no more of the invasion of southern rights; if they dared make the attempt he himself would meet his northern friends at Mason and Dixon's line, not as brothers, but with "banner, brand and bow." Let him adhere to this determination when the rights of the South are invaded; let him be prepared to defend them; when the Scots cross the border line, let him, as a true knight, wind the cornage horn.

Know-Nothingism professes to be eminently patriotic, struggling for the common weal, not for office. Well, Mr. Chairman, why is it, that wherever they have reached power they have proscribed all, from the highest officials even down to the hog constables of the little towns. Anticipating a majority in the next House of Representatives, there are already hosts of applicants for the places within its gift. Yes, sir, if all the men who aspire to these offices were formed into regiments and drilled for a few weeks, General Scott could take them to the Crimea and carry Sebastopol by storm. They are looking after all the places, from the Speaker's chair down to the humble office held by the sable high-priest who ministers at the altars of the temple of Cloacina, in the basement of this Capitol. [Laughter.] Look at their election in this city! It was an extraordinary affair. They seemed to be after the exchequer, the first thing, like Sir John Falstaff. They desired to get the control of the funds of the Washington National Monument. They banded together in this capital and proscribed such men as General Winfield Scott, William W. Seaton, General Walter Jones, Hon. Elisha Whittlesey, and others, to make room for such renowned and august individuals as Vespasian Ellis, French S. Evans, et id omne genus. Yes, sir, General Scott was proscribed; the eagle was stricken from his aerie to put the mousing owl there. This plot is said to have been concocted at the National Council of Know-Nothings held at Cincinnati. What right had these intolerant proscriptionists to take in charge the monument to Washington? Let his own words rebuke them. I read from a letter written by the Father of his country to a committee of the Baptist church of Virginia. After paying a high and just compliment to the Baptists for their patriotism and liberality, he says:

"If I could have entertained the slightest apprehension that the Constitution framed in the convention where I had the honor to preside might possibly endanger the religious rights of any ecclesiastical society, certainly I would never have placed my signature to it; and if I could now conceive that the General Government might ever be so administered as to render the liberty of conscience insecure, I beg you will be persuaded that no one would be more zealous than myself to establish effectual barriers against the horrors of spiritual tyranny, and every species of religious persecution; for you doubtless remember I have often expressed my sentiments that every man, conducting himself as a good citizen, and being accountable to God alone for his religious opinions, ought to be protected in worshipping the Deity according to the dictates of his own conscience."

Mr. Chairman, I have heard many strange sentiments expressed in this Hall, but there was one uttered by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BANKS,] which, for boldness and originality, surpasses all others. After speaking of the power, the secret plans, the covered cavernous ways of the order, he says:

"Sir, it is the people who are passing through these avenues, those who make judges and district attorneys, and they will take care of them all. They will take care of the juries and sheriffs as well as the judges."

The startling announcement has been made by a Representative on the floor of the American Congress, that this secret order is to take charge of the judges and juries of the country. Yes, sir, it is to lay its ruthless hand upon the judicial ermine. When that is done, our laws will not be worth the paper on which they are written. If the judges of the courts are to be overawed by the combinations and machinations of midnight conspirators, what becomes of our individual safety? Is such an association fit for American citizens? Can it be commended to the South? The judiciary is the great shield of our protection. Destroy it, and the Constitution would be no more than a rope of sand.

These people took care of Judge Loring. This is an illustration of the feeling existing in what is called the Athens of America. There a judge is prescribed for doing what he conscientiously believed to be his duty. He did his duty; and I presume that no man will here deny it. He delivered up to his owner, after a patient hearing of all the facts, the fugitive slave, Anthony Burns; and for this he is proscribed and hunted down as a wild beast. This is what is meant by the taking care of judges.

Is not a Know-Nothing association illegal? It has been so held by one of the ablest jurists of the country. Judge Porter, of Pennsylvania, once a member of the Cabinet, in a late charge to a grand jury in reference to it, used this language:

"If any number of men combine to form themselves into an association by agreements, vows, or oaths, to control the opinions and votes of any portion of our citizens in the exercise of their suffrages, so that they shall vote not according to their own choice or the dictates of their own consciences, but as a majority of such association shall determine, it is a conspiracy, and punishable as such by indictment.

"And you will remember that it is the agreement to do the act that constitutes the criminality, even if the act itself be not done. It may be well here to observe, that, if any person or persons shall have unthinkingly, unadvisedly, or without being aware of the criminal character of such an act, joined such association, or taken upon himself any such vows, obligations, or oaths, they are not binding upon him in law, and ought not to be in morals. He will enact the part of a good citizen by eschewing all such fellowship or association, and abandoning the illegal enterprise."

This Know-Nothingism is a step in advance of Jesuitism. It combines higher-law "ism"—it claims supremacy over all laws. Is such an institution to be tolerated?

"Is law to be perverted from its course?
Is abject fraud to league with brutal force?
Is freedom to be crushed, and every son
Who dares maintain her cause to be undone?
Is base corruption creeping through the land
To plan and work her ruin undermand?"

Mr. Chairman, in the sincerity of my heart, I hope the people of the South will take warning, and not affiliate with such an organization. I have reason to believe that many good and patriotic men in the South, of both political parties, have joined this new movement. It is to be hoped they will take warning in time. I beseech them to study more closely the aims of this order, before deciding in its favor. I beseech them to test "Sam" by his principles, and they will find that, like the evil spirit when touched with the spear of Ithuriel, he will squat, toad-like, to the earth. They will find that "Sam," the good genius of this Know-Nothing order, has flirted and caressed with every "ism" of the day. Sir, I proclaim it with pride, that the State which I have the honor, in part, to represent has, at all times and under all circumstances, been true to the Constitution and the Union. She is eminently conservative, and no "ism" ever got foothold there, and for this she has been charged with being always asleep. Better, far better, that she should sleep on, than to arouse from her slumbers to find herself locked in the meretricious embraces of that graceless libertine, dubbed by its godfathers with the euphonious and classical sobriquet of "Sam." I have too high a regard for my native State, to suspect, for even a moment, that her people will be controlled by such influences. North Carolina will do nothing to endanger the liberties of her people and the union of these States—nothing to tarnish the bright escutcheon of her ancient renown. In the olden time she was the first to rise up against the oppressions of the British King. Within her borders the first declaration of independence was made—the hills of Mecklenberg first echoed the hosannas of a people who had declared themselves free and independent, and along Carolina's mountain passes first reverberated the sacred hymn of freedom, "nature's melodious anthem," as her patriotic sons hailed with soul-stirring shouts the new-born Goddess of American liberty. The men of that day met openly and boldly; and God forbid that their descendants should discard the noble example.

If there are laws requiring repeal or amendment, why not go about the work openly as heretofore? The time is not auspicious for the southern people to inaugurate new practices. It is said, that in the Know-Nothing councils the majority govern absolutely, and that the national council governs the State councils. Who can tell what mandatory edicts this National Council may issue? Northern Know-Nothings control it; northern Know-Nothings are in favor of excluding all persons who cannot read and write from voting. Will their southern brethren stand with them on that platform? The North has kept the South poor by high protective tariffs and navigation laws; has drawn from it that wealth which would have enabled it to educate all its people, and now, because we have a large number of persons who have not received the benefits of an education, the northern Know-Nothings arrogantly propose to add insult to injury, by declaring to us who are to be admitted to the right of suffrage. They had as well let us alone; we can manage our own affairs. The Whigs of the South have, heretofore, advocated principles. Why quit them now? Why should any southern Democrat quit his party now? It has proved itself equal to every emergency. Under its principles the country has prospered. It is the party of progress, of States-rights, of the Constitution; pledged to maintain all its guarantees. General Pierce has proved true to the principles upon which he was elected, true to the Constitution, and consequently true to the South. If he has lost ground, he has lost it by maintaining the rights of the South. He has proved himself a friend to the South. Ingratitude is not a trait in southern character, and every true Democrat in the southern States will sustain his Administration so long as he stands on that great platform, the "Constitution of our country," and administers the Government upon the principles of that instrument.

THE COLLINS STEAMERS, &c.

SPEECH OF HON. S. R. MALLORY,

OF FLORIDA,

IN THE SENATE, February 27, 1855.

The Senate having under consideration the bill providing for the transportation of the United States Mail in Ocean Steamers—

Mr. MALLORY said:

Mr. PRESIDENT: Before the motion to adjourn was made, I was proceeding to say that I should have contented myself with a silent vote but for the observations of the honorable Senator from Michigan [Mr. STUART] upon the condition of the Navy, and the incidental reflection on the propriety of the recommendations of the Committee on Naval Affairs in regard to the service. If any other member of the committee would now rise to respond to the assertions of that Senator, it would afford me greater pleasure to keep my seat than to say a word in response.

I confess, Mr. President, that the proposition now before the Senate, coming as it does from the House of Representatives, struck me with surprise; and I concur in every word uttered by the honorable Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BUTLER] on that subject. I very much mistake the sentiment of this body if it will, upon a full discussion of the question, surrender the power which it now holds over this question of notice. In looking at the facts of the case, I find that they lie in a nut-shell, and I propose to state them briefly to the Senate.

The offer of Mr. Collins made on the 6th of March, 1846, contemplated the building of five ships. Whether this offer was induced by the Postmaster General or not, I am unprepared to say. It is enough that Mr. Collins came to Washington with this offer to build five ships of not less than two thousand tons each. The minimum size was fixed to suit his convenience and not that of the Government. Another stipulation was, that they were to be "of great speed and sufficiently strong for war purposes." This provision will strike the mind of every Senator who looks to the character of the contract. I suppose the term "war purposes" embraces every possible incident and contingency of naval warfare, from the transportation of troops and munitions of war, to fighting battles upon the high seas, yard-arm to yard-arm. We are left to float on the sea of conjecture as to the exact understanding of the contractors; but we may by examining the specifications by which these vessels were constructed determine for ourselves whether they are fit for war purposes or not, and to what extent.

The Collins contract provided for the construction of five steamships, which should carry the mails, making twenty trips per annum, for the annual compensation of $385,000. Four ships only were constructed. In 1852 the contractors appealed to Congress, alleged their inability to continue their service without ruinous loss, produced their exhibits to show receipts and disbursements, and asked to be paid (if my recollection be correct, for I have no data before me) $858,000 per annum, they agreeing to make twenty-six instead of twenty trips per annum. This proposition startled the country at the time. The disproportion between the proposed increase of compensation and the service to be performed was remarkable. Rival companies, contractors, and proprietors of ocean steamers came to Washington, active competition was awakened, and it was soon ascertained that the service then actually performed by the Collins ships could be performed by others for the same compensation, with an increase. But the friends of the Collins line were strong, and they triumphed. Congress yielded to their demands, but, in doing so, reserved the right of giving the notice in question. In this condition of the subject, sir, while the representatives of the people and the States here assembled are struggling to restrict the public expenditure within wise and legitimate limits, we receive a proposition for this very mail service which, if accepted, will save some $300,000 of the public money per annum.

Sir, from whom does this come? Not from a mere speculator or unknown adventurer, certainly, but from an American citizen, whose reputation as an enterprising, accomplished, and successful projector of ocean steam navigation is universally conceded in this country, and is familiar to Europe. His offer is to perform the same service, in the same time and manner in which it is now performed by the Collins ships, for $19,250 per trip, or $500,000 per annum. If we accept this offer we save to the public Treasury $357,500 per annum, a sum more, I apprehend, than the total expenditures within my own State for postal service. Now, sir, why should we not accept this offer? Are we at liberty to reject it? Can any doubt exist that it is not made in good faith, made with a bona fide intention of complying with its terms? Why, sir, if the national reputation, enterprise, and wealth of Mr. Vanderbilt afford us no security upon this point, certainly, the declarations of the Senator from Tennessee must remove all reasonable doubt. That Senator rises in his place here, and upon his responsibility indorses this proposition, and declares further, that the party in question stands ready, if his offer be accepted, to enter into bonds in the sum of $2,000,000 for the faithful performance of its stipulations. This we must regard as conclusive; and that the Senate so regards it is evident from the fact that the honorable Senator's declarations have been received unquestioned, and no Senator here doubts his authority or the sincerity with which the proposition is made.

Mr. President, to myself this proposition and these statements are as new as they were unexpected; nor was I aware that this service could be performed upon terms so favorable to the country. Of Mr. Vanderbilt I know personally nothing, never having seen him to my knowledge; but for the reasons stated I do not feel at liberty, nor do I understand how others can, to disregard his proposition.

The honorable Senator from Delaware, [Mr. BAYARD,] who submitted a few brief remarks on the question a short time since, but who, I trust, will give us his views in full before the vote is taken, said that the difference between the offer of Mr. Vanderbilt and the amount we are now paying, is more than compensated by the postages we now receive, which postages he indicated would be less than they are at present, if the vessels took a longer time to make the trips. In reply to that I have merely to say, that whatever the time may be which is made by Mr. Collins's ships, Mr. Vanderbilt undertakes to make. But, sir, it must be remembered that time was not an element of the Collins contract, and he was at liberty to cross the Atlantic in whatever time his own interest might dictate; and that, under his existing contract, should the speed of his ships, with increasing age or decay, be diminished one half, the Government would be powerless to accelerate it; and hence, sir, you will at once perceive that Mr. Vanderbilt's offer to make the time of the Collins line, fixing, as it does, a minimum time, is more favorable to the Government than the existing contract with Mr. Collins. I have no doubt that he would excel the Collins time, sir; for in this progressive age, when the ingenuity of man is devising means to annihilate time, when the telegraph is becoming a "slow coach" to our impatience, the ship which makes the run between New York and Liverpool but one hour quicker than all others, will necessarily have the preference of mails and passengers.

My honorable friend from Delaware, I think, is in error as to the question of postage. The postage stated in our official returns for the past fiscal year, from the Collins contract, is $153,377; while the difference, as I have heretofore shown, between the Collins and Vanderbilt offers, is $357,500. Upon this point I will not dwell, for the figures speak for themselves; but I will ask gentlemen to examine them and determine whether they should be disregarded.

With me, sir, the propriety of our appropriations of the public money is controlled, not by their amount, but by their legality and national policy and expediency. But, while for legitimate objects of appropriation, a wise liberality may frequently be the soundest economy, I trust I may never be found voting away a dollar of the public money without justification upon these premises.

That the Collins steamers appeal to our national pride, and merit, to a certain extent, national support, I am ready to admit; and in all that has been said here of the enterprise, boldness, and success of their projector, their thorough adaptation to the transportation of mails and passengers, and of their superiority of speed and details of structure, I fully concur. As carriers between the shores of Great Britain and the United States they stand unequaled. Nor have I failed to observe the national advantages derived from that bold and superior effort in the casting and construction of engines and machinery among us which the enterprise and success of Mr. Collins originated. We have made rapid progress in our means and ability to meet, in our machine shops, the wants of ocean steam navigation; and I know that the construction of the engines, shafts and cylinders for these ships developed and encouraged these means and this ability in a remarkable manner.

But, sir, in admitting this we cannot fail to see that every day develops some new and useful addition to our means of ocean navigation, and that we are upon the threshold of startling discoveries or improvements which will bring all parts of the earth in closer proximity, and which must necessarily advance the general good of our race. Even while we are here speaking, a steamer of twenty thousand tons, or six times the size of either of the Collins ships, is being constructed in Great Britain for the Australian trade; and the genius of man is devising the means of crossing the Atlantic in six days. Now, sir, since, through the judicious aid of this Government, the Collins ships have been created and maintained, why should we declare in advance, that similar aid shall not be extended to others? Why should we, by surrendering our right to terminate this contract, and declaring it absolute for the next five years, deprive ourselves of the power of making a better one within that time? Suppose next year steamers should be built to cross the Atlantic in eight days, what chance of profitable competition could they possibly have while the Collins ships receive this $858,000? In such an event, we would be compelled to purchase the Collins ships to get them out of our way. But, sir, what right have we thus gratuitously to tie the hands of our successors, and to preclude them from availing themselves of all the advantages which science and discovery may hold out in ocean navigation? None whatever, sir; and depend upon it, that this proposition will sound strangely in the ears of our people.

But, Mr. President, it was not my design to discuss this branch of the subject, but to reply to those who have deemed it proper upon this occasion to denounce our Navy, and incidentally to condemn your naval committees.

The honorable Senator from Texas [Mr. RUSK] speaks of the great advantages our commercial marine derives from our appropriations to the Collins steamers. I do not perceive this so clearly, sir; nor do I see any advantage which would not equally accrue to it from appropriations to any other steamships. If we appropriated money generally to steamships, I could readily understand how the shipping interest would be developed and fostered; but so long as the business between New York and Liverpool remains as it is, supporting one line only, I am unable to understand the Senator's argument that when we declare that one set of ships exclusively shall receive $858,000 per annum, and shall continue to receive it for five years to come, wherein the encouragement to other ships consists. The honorable Senator speaks in exalted terms of these ships as war steamers; the same judgment is pronounced by the Senator from Michigan, [Mr. STUART,] and as this argument is made and relied upon in both Houses to sustain appropriations for them, I deem it proper to reply to it somewhat in detail.

Sir, depend upon it, my friend from Texas has never examined either the ships or this view of the subject; for I know too well, and have too much respect for his judgment to suppose that he would thus speak if he had done so, or that he would vote an appropriation to place one of these ships in our Navy.

Mr. RUSK. I would most cheerfully. This day, if we wanted a war steamer, I should regard them as not only better for service in war than any we have in our Navy, but better than any in the British or any other navy.

Mr. MALLORY. I am glad that my honorable friend announces his opinions so unequivocally, because I am more than ever convinced that he has not examined the condition of our Navy, or that of Great Britain; that he has not duly considered the requisites of war steamers; and that I shall be able, perhaps, to show even to himself the error of his judgment. He regards them, as war steamers, superior to the naval ships of Britain or France.

Mr. RUSK. Of equal tonnage.

Mr. MALLORY. That is equivalent to saying that they are equal to the largest British or French war steamers—for, if my memory be correct, the Baltic's tonnage is not exceeded by that of the Royal Albert, the John Watt, the Agamemnon, the Napoleon, or by many of the first-rate ships of those navies.

The contract between the Government and Mr. Collins contains a stipulation that these steamers should have "great speed" and be built "sufficiently strong for war purposes." Now, sir, I have never understood what was meant by "war purposes," nor was it understood by the Government examiners of these vessels. The transportation of troops, provisions, mails, dispatches, or munitions of war, during the existence of a maritime war, are embraced within the term "war purposes;" yet the contracting parties must have meant more than this, for such duties may be performed by any steamship in our ports, and by many of them, under certain circumstances, better than the Collins ships. But, sir, these duties are required only during actual hostilities, whereas the most efficient, as well, perhaps, as the most glorious, service of a war vessel is to cruise in times of peace and to exhibit such a readiness and adaptation for war as to make peace preferable to our enemies.

But, sir, to me these terms, if they imply anything, must be understood to mean an ability to fight the battles of our country upon the high seas. Upon this ground we can all stand without misapprehension; for these terms at once recall to the mind not only the glorious struggles of our own Navy—when ship to ship and yard-arm to yard-arm, we snatched the sceptre of invincibility from Britain—but those memorable fleet battles and single combats of ships upon the great deep which have been treasured in the songs of every age.

And here let me ask my honorable friend [Mr. RUSK] if he has any knowledge of decided naval battles having been fought at a greater distance between ships than pistol shot? Why, sir, I could recall a hundred to his mind, in which the struggle was hand to hand; and he well knows that Britain won her glorious character on the deep only through her habit of close fighting. The two actions which most distinguished our naval courage and seamanship were those between the Bonhomme Richard and the Serapis, and between the Constitution and Guerriere. In the first the rammers of our guns had to be thrust through the ports of the enemy to enable us to load; and not a gun disturbed the deathly stillness of the Constitution's decks until the enemy was within pistol range. In such a contest, sir, when the destructive character of sea batteries is augmented a hundred fold, when rapidity and accuracy in gunnery practice are in full development, what would become of such ships as these, whose side wheels, shafts, boilers, and machinery, whose very life, in short, are all defenseless upon the surface, and exposed to utter annihilation by a single shot? My friend speaks of their great speed. Let me ask him to point out the advantages of speed in such contests as I have described. To fight at all, ships must be in close proximity. The very character of their element renders successful fighting at any distance out of the question; and of what benefit to war ships would be the speed of the locomotive, if with its speed were combined the locomotives exposure and vulnerability? But, sir, the argument in favor of this great speed is fallacious. Great speed in large ships can only be attained by great boiler surface, and great consumption of fuel, and while the first exposes the boiler to every shot, the latter deprives the ship of the power of remaining at sea beyond a few days.

Now, sir, the Collins ships burn from eighty to one hundred tons of coal every twenty-four hours, and this enormous consumption must ever prevent them from carrying our flag into distant seas; for they could not carry sufficient coal to sustain themselves; nor can we belive for a moment that, sharp and lean as they are, anything like present speed could be maintained, if armed and provisioned, and strengthened as ships of war. But, apart from all this sir, their construction as shown by the specifications accompanying the contract, prove them to be extremely weak and light in comparison to vessels built as war ships; and to make this apparent, we have but to examine and compare them with the construction of the steam frigates now in progress. While these frigates are timbered with the best of seasoned live oak, and planked with white oak, the frames of the Collins ships are composed of white oak, locust, chesnut and cedar, and they are planked with pine. These different woods are all of unequal durability; their decay under the various modifications of wear and tear must be unequal; and the result is, that repairs must always be needed. Their pine bottoms are an insuperable objection. Not that pine is less durable than the white oak in our naval ships, but because it does not hold the bolts, or what is technically called the fastenings, so well. The action of the powerful engines of these ships produces a constant tremulous action upon the hull, which, in addition to other obvious causes tends to shake or disturb the bolts which hold the planking to the timbers; and the fibre of the oak resists this tendency far better than pine.

The specifications alluded to show the frames of these ships to be "four feet from center to center, and the timbers to ride ten inches;" that is, to a surface of twenty inches of timber there is immediately adjoining an opening of twenty-eight inches. Here it will be seen that solidity was sacrificed to speed, and to these mixed timbers of light cedar, locust, and chestnut—planked with pine—and having between them these extraordinary spaces (extraordinary for war vessels) of twenty-eight inches, must we look for the causes of the Arctic's loss. The Vesta which sunk her, was about two hundred tons burden, and her cutwater, it will be remembered, remained wedged in between the timbers of the Arctic. Every man conversant with this subject—nay, every sensible man in the country—must see that, had the Arctic's sides been constructed as our naval ships are, such a thing could not have occurred. The thickness of the sides of the new steam frigates is twenty-four inches at the water line—a solid wall of live oak frames and white oak planks—and to twenty-six inches of timber there is a space only of eight inches. Such a mass of the best timber, twenty-four inches thick, thoroughly bolted and riveted together, could have received no material injury from such an encounter. But, when the Vesta struck the Arctic, stem on, in the fore channels, she unfortunately struck between the frames, or in the open space, and the pine planking offered the only resistance. When these gave way the ship filled.

I have seen an account of a collision between an iron steamer and a merchant ship, which was so remarkably like the case of the Arctic that I deem it worthy of quotation. It is this:

"The ship Young Brander, Hamilton, of and from New Orleans, which was in contact with the iron screw steamer Pactolius, off Tuskar, was struck in the fore channels, cutting the ship from the water up to five planks on deck, carrying away mizen top mast, back stay, lanyard, and main-brace; eight timbers were stove in, and all the thick work and water-ways between decks, and from forty to fifty knees, were broken, starting almost every butt in the ship. The iron cutwater of the steamer, weighing about two tons, was driven clean through the side of the ship, till it reached the cargo of cotton, when it broke, and remained hanging to the ship after the collision—the steamer was going at the rate of thirteen knots at the time. Captain Hamilton had the usual lights set, and a man on the look-out, who warned the steamer to keep off. It would cost from £3,000 to £4,000 to repair the ship, and the Captain has sued the steamer for damages. The same steamer was afterward in collision with a bark, and had to put into Liverpool for repairs."

Such being the weak materials of these light passenger ships, let us look at their fastening. They are not through bolted; that is, the outside plank is spiked and tree-nailed (or pegged) to the timbers only, and not through the inside or ceiling plank; and these inside plank, in like manner are unconnected with the outside plank. Now, in our new steam frigates, and I have most carefully gone over, step by step, the one in progress at this navy-yard, every outside plank has two copper bolts going through every frame which it crosses, and through the inside plank where it is riveted, besides two short bolts.

The knees, those most important parts, upon which the general strength so much depends, are not bolted through the outside plank or wales to give the requisite strength, as is universally the case with our substantial naval ships; and they have so much iron fastening in them, that, taken in connection with their general structure for lightness and speed, it can hardly be expected that they will last over ten years of good service.

Naval steamships, constructed for fighting, giving and receiving broadsides, can never attain the speed of merchant ships built for no such purpose.

A ship of war must not only possess the power to destroy an adversary, but she must herself be able to withstand his shock. Consequently her boiler and all other vital parts of her machinery must be placed below the water-line, out of his reach, and when this is done, no very great speed is attainable; and hence it must be that the merchant steamers of all nations must greatly excel in speed their naval steamers. The boilers of the Collins ships built high for greater steam surface, project far above the lower deck, and consequently not only is the boiler exposed to every shot, but the beams uniting the sides of the ship, are cut away to make room for it. The shaft of their paddle-wheels is three feet at least above the main deck; and this brings a large portion of the machinery above the main deck. Thus it will be seen that, to obtain speed, the boiler and the shaft are, in these ships, necessarily placed so high that for a length of near one hundred feet amid-ships of these so-called war steamers, there are but three beams in each of their two decks; and it is on one of these decks that it is proposed to mount the guns—guns which weigh, with their carriages, each ten tons.

But, Mr. President, I will not go further into these details; for surely I have said enough to show gentlemen their light, buoyant, and elegant structure, so admirably adapted to speed, but so unsuited for war purposes. The Senator from Michigan has produced here a letter written by Commodore Perry two years ago, and one written by Commodore Stewart a few days ago, since this subject was agitated in Congress, both apparently sustaining the character of these ships as war vessels. Sir, I have a high regard for Commodore Stewart. I feel towards him, sir, as every American should feel towards one who has done so much to establish and maintain his country's honor. But yet, sir, great names have with me but little weight when unsustained by reason; and unless the conclusions to which Commodore Stewart arrives are supported by other arguments than those given in this letter, I must be pardoned for adhering to my own judgment. I do not think that Commodore Perry would dissent from any fact I have stated to-night, or from any conclusion I have drawn from them; nor can I perceive, taking his letter and his various other official reports and letters upon these ships together, that there is any essential difference in our views.

And, sir, let me tell my honorable friends from Michigan and Texas [Mr. STUART and Mr. RUSK] that, when it became apparent to the British Government that war with Russia was inevitable, and she began to count up her available resources, her side-wheel ships were not held or enumerated as "war steamers," but as transports. A board of experienced officers examined the whole subject of naval warfare, and reported against the ability of side wheels for war purposes. Britain at once began to put propellers into her sailing ships, and she now has the most powerful fleet of war ships that ever floated. None of them have attained anything like the speed of the Collins ships. They are sailing ships with an auxiliary screw, and their steam power is secondary to their sailing power. These heavy ships of Britain and France, possessing, as they do, all the power, advantages, and ability of thoroughly appointed sailing liners, with an auxiliary steam power of from four to seven knots, are the most formidable naval batteries afloat. All their machinery is below the water line, secure from shot; and should they, in any close hand to hand struggle, like those of Trafalgar, Navarino, or the Nile, have every spar shot away, and their hulls above water riddled with shot, so far from impairing their efficiency, their submerged machinery would but drive them the faster, and their tremendous batteries would still be as deadly. These ships are striking illustrations of the remark of one of England's brilliant naval commanders—Captain Plunkett, I think—that "a side-wheel ship paddles best without her sails, and sails best without her paddles; whereas a propeller screws best with her sails, and sails best with her screw."

Mr. President, in further reply to the assertions so broadly made, of the ability of these Collins ships to engage in naval battles upon the sea with ships of equal size, I will observe, that, in my judgment, the perfection of a war ship would be a combination of the greatest known speed and the heaviest known battery in one vessel; or, in other words, a ship of a hundred and forty heavy guns having the speed of the Collins ships. But this, from the very nature and requirements of the subject, has not been, nor does it seem likely to be, attained; and we must combine these two elements of power—speed and battery—in such manner as will best accomplish the particular end in view. This country must always maintain a certain number of ships in foreign and distant seas, and necessarily upon protracted cruises. Without colonies, coal depots, or refitting stations, (with which Britain and France are so well supplied,) these ships must have the ability to maintain themselves at sea without resort to port. They must be manned, provisioned, and furnished with all things needful and necessary for a long voyage and constant efficiency. Such ships must be large, with heavy batteries. The space allotted to coals must be comparatively small, and steam, which must be auxiliary only to their sailing qualities, must be resorted to only upon special emergencies. They cannot steam fast; for, in the first place, the space below the water line, allotted to machinery and the size of the boiler, must be limited, while the consumption of fuel must be reduced to the minimum quantity. In such ships, therefore, we must sacrifice speed for battery. But the ships of our coastwise or home squadron, whose operations are confined to our own seas and shores, whose cruises from port may be limited to a few days, with ship-yards, and coal depots, and work-shops ever under their lea, such ships are required to be fast; they are the eyes of the country; and their glances at anything approaching our shores should be rapidly taken. Here, then, we may well sacrifice battery for speed; but it must be a speed combined with powers of defense and endurance. The speed of the Collins ships, so long as their fuel lasted, would certainly enable them to escape an enemy, or evade an engagement, which their exposed and defenseless hulls and machinery would render fatal; for the breaking of a crank, or the bursting of a steam pipe or boiler—an enemy's broadside at close quarters could hardly fail to do this—would leave them as helpless upon the sea as a crippled bird.

If it shall appear, Mr. President, that our public service requires such ships as these, it is the dictate of wisdom and economy to build them ourselves, and in doing so, to make those improvements and avoid those errors which experience has taught us. These ships already show evidences of weakness and decay. One of them, if my memory serves me correctly, is running her third shaft, and their repairs, as shown by the exhibits of Mr. Collins, are frequent and expensive. I presume a proposition will be made before long to dispose of them to the Government; but I trust that we shall have wisdom enough to crush any such folly. The time is rapidly approaching when they will demand thorough and most expensive repairs; and it is just at this particular time that a prudent owner would seek to get rid of them, and that a prudent purchaser would avoid them; for the attempt to repair an old steamship, in this progressive day, after hard usage, and built of light, mixed, and unseasoned materials, is very much like having the wolf by the ears, it is useless to hold on, and perilous to let her go.

The honorable Senator from Michigan, Mr. President, says that all the money which has been expended for our naval ships might as well have been thrown into the sea. This is a very strange remark. Why, sir, it will sound strangely in the ears, not only of our own naval men, but of those of Europe. Does not the honorable Senator know that our naval ships, for model, material, and construction; for sailing qualities, buoyancy, and capacity for carrying their batteries, crews, and provisions; for strength and durability; in short, for the combined excellencies of naval ships, are acknowledged by the naval Powers of Europe to have no superiors. Our ships have ever been the admiration of all foreign officers, and at this very hour, while the honorable Senator from Michigan denounces them, they challenge comparison with the ships of all other nations.

Our steam machines have sometimes failed, but the reason is obvious. We have no national machine shops except the limited establishment at this navy-yard; and, relying upon contracts for our steam machinery, we are too frequently imposed upon in its quality and workmanship. But, sir, let me say to the honorable Senator that our frigate Mississippi, side-wheel as she is, and therefore unfit to fight, has done more service for the same expenditure of money than any steamer, merchant or otherwise, that floats. Burning but from twenty to thirty tons of coal per day, under full steam, she has great power, and has performed services of the greatest value to the country. Let me refer him, too, to the San Jacinto, of which accounts have reached me to-day. She is a magnificent ship in all respects; makes twelve knots under canvas alone; and recently, when two of three blades of her propeller broke off, leaving her with but one, she made very good headway under steam with that one. The honorable Senator from Texas alluded to the battles of the last war as being fought by men who had learned their profession before the mast——

Mr. RUSK. The Senator from South Carolina said it was not the merchant marine, but the officers of the Navy who fought the last war; and my remarks were in answer to that statement.

Mr. MALLORY. Well, sir, the Senator is right in saying that his remarks were based on what was said by the Senator from South Carolina; but in reply, I will remark that the national reputation which we have as a naval power rests, not upon one or all of the battles fought by our merchant seamen, but upon those fought by our Navy. When we entered upon the last war, we did so with many misgivings as to the results. In the language of a noble statesman, we went into it feeble, and as it were with but a sling in our hands.

Mr. RUSK. Will the honorable Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. MALLORY. Certainly.

Mr. RUSK. If there had been no sailors on board any of the vessels which fought during the last war who had acquired their profession in the merchant marine, does he think there would have been a single victory?

Mr. MALLORY. The Senator and myself agree perfectly that the merchant marine is the school for seamen, not in our own country alone, but in every country. It is that school to which we naturally look for seamen; and we should cherish and nurture it, and protect it, as the school from which our naval seamen are to be drawn. Our seamen of the last war were nurtured in the commercial marine, but not of our country alone; for we had men in our Navy from all parts of the habitable globe, although we professed to have none but Americans born; and we had men, too, of every color. But, sir, what I do say is, that no single fight, no number of fights, and no conduct of the merchant marine of this country ever gave character to our naval warfare. Why, sir, we were reminded here but a few days ago, of a striking incident in relation to this subject. When the British, forgetful of their own magnanimous character, were ruthlessly imitating the deeds of their freebooters, and were tearing this capital to pieces, a British naval officer mounted the naval monument erected to the heroes of the Tripolitan war, and which still stands before us, and, snatching the pen from the hand of the muse of History, declared that she had no use for it, because the American Navy had no history to write; and, sir, up to that day, with the exception of the Tripolitan war, the taunt was partially true; for our Navy had no history to write. But, sir, History soon vindicated herself, and avenged the insult; for every page of her journal of the last war records something which shows that our Navy has a history, and a glorious history—a history, sir, which, though replete with personal daring and devotion, teeming with courage, and patriotism crowned with eminent success, is unsullied by a single instance of cowardice, or a breath of treachery. Yes, sir, our naval men restored the pen to History's hand, and with it the sceptre of British invincibility; and, no longer breathing the vandal spirit of her despoiling official, the frank and manly hearts of Britain, so prone to do justice to an adversary in a fair stand-up fight, accorded to our Navy their praises and commendations. Individual instances of the heroic daring of privateers marked the war. Such was the case of the General Armstrong. But these were not the features of the struggle which gave us a national character as a naval people; but it was acquired by the victories and the conduct of such men as Hull, Stewart, Lawrence, Bainbridge, Perry, and their gallant associates.

The Senator from Texas speaks of officers idling away their time on shore. This remark I frequently hear made, and to me it ever seems unjust. Why, sir, we must always have a sufficient number of officers to relieve those at sea occasionally. Would you keep a man always at sea, always abroad from his country? No, sir; it is the interest of the Republic that they should be identified and linked to it by ties no less enduring than those which bind us all; and let me say too, that the profession which presupposes always abroad, which ostracises him from home and kindred, which precludes marriage and crushes the holiest affections which cluster around the heart; is unworthy the ambition of any honorable mind. But, Mr. President, I will not longer detain the Senate, nor would I have offered these remarks, made as they are, unexpectedly, without preparation or notes, crude and unconnected; but for the fact, that, as a member of your Committee on Naval Affairs, I do not feel myself at liberty to listen to attacks here upon the service, based, as I conceived, in palpable error, without responding. I profess no more regard for the Navy than other gentlemen; but I know its past services, its present condition, and believe in its glorious future; and while I have a seat here, it shall never want a voice to sustain and cherish it. I entertain earnest hopes that the bill which we have recently passed to promote its efficiency will breathe new life into the service, and that it will soon become what it was at the close of the last war.

DIPLOMATIC SYSTEM OF THE UNITED STATES.

OF LOUISIANA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

January 11, 1855.

Mr. PERKINS said: I am instructed by the Committee on Foreign Affairs to report to the House, and put upon its passage, the consular and diplomatic bill, which it has had under consideration.

There are constantly referred to that committee claims of different kinds arising under our foreign intercourse, upon the justice and legality of which it is expected to give an opinion. The investigation of these claims involves a reference to existing law and the customs and practice of the State Department. In the discharge of this duty the committee has labored constantly under embarrassment from the unsettled character of the rules regulating the duties and pay of our foreign agents. From a defective organization of the foreign service of the Government in the first instance, reference has now to be had to precedent rather than established law. The consequence is, that a great variety of claims are annually presented against the Government through uncertainty as to what services are properly required to be discharged, and the remuneration that should attach to them. In deciding upon claims of this character the committee has had to be governed either by precedent, or the peculiar circumstances of equity in each particular case.

In this, too, they have met with difficulty; for it has happened that our Secretaries of State have differed as to the rules that should govern in many of these cases, and the decisions of the Department have, consequently, changed with its administration. As the Committee on Foreign Affairs changes, too, with each Congress—some of its members going out, and new ones being added—its decisions have increased the uncertainty.

To relieve themselves and the House from the evils of this uncertainty, early last session the committee called upon the head of the Department of State for his views as to a thorough remodeling of our consular and diplomatic systems, in order to its establishment on definite principles. The Secretary of State replied, referring the committee to the several plans heretofore proposed to Congress for that purpose, and to the expression of his predecessors in office upon them. He also offered the committee access to the suggestions of persons in the foreign employ, and upon file in the Department.

The report of Mr. Livingston, made to Congress in 1833, and that of Mr. Buchanan in 1846; the report of a special committee raised upon the subject in this House in 1845, and the bills introduced into Congress in 1844 and in 1846, and other plans prepared in the Department, but never presented to Congress, were all examined. Consultation was had with those long engaged, both in the consular and diplomatic service of the country; and after examination and comparison, the result of the action of the committee was the report and bill unanimously presented to this House last session. That bill was printed and referred to the Committee of the Whole House. It was distributed among members of the House, and sent abroad to all our consular and diplomatic agents.

During the late recess of Congress numerous and valuable suggestions were received in reply from those in the past and actual foreign service of the country; and, at the opening of the present session, the bill was taken up from the Committee of the Whole and referred back again to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, that it might be revised and improved in some of its provisions.

The bill that I have now reported to the House is the original bill thus matured. It has been modified in some of its minor details, but in its general character and principles it is identically the same bill that was originally reported. It omits some things contained in each of the bills heretofore before Congress, and embraces everything, it is believed, in which previous bills have been unanimous. Its provisions cannot, therefore, be regarded in the light of experiments, but rather as the results of the experience of all who have been heretofore occupied with, or have examined, the subject.

In asking, Mr. Speaker, the attention of the House for a few moments, while I point out the reforms in our existing systems proposed by this bill, I am painfully sensible of my inability to make interesting to the House a subject necessarily of so much detail. I do not design to speak of the foreign policy of the country, nor of the necessity of some kind of machinery for conducting it. I take it for granted that the age of entire national isolation has passed, and that, however independent we may be of other Governments in our foreign policy, still we are now, and will ever be, necessarily bound to them, in a certain degree, by ties of commerce and humanity that, with the increase of knowledge among mankind, will bring the people of this country more into connection with the people of the rest of the world, and, at the same time, multiply the points of contact between our own and other Governments.

I will, also, in what I have to say, take it for granted that a system of foreign ministers and consuls resident abroad, such as has been found necessary in the experience of all other civilized Governments, is required under our own Government.

To the existence of such a class of men, Wheaton, in his Law of Nations, has ascribed the great advance of Europe in civilization within the last century; and, as our forefathers, after employing special ministers during the Revolution, and under the Confederation, decided on the first nominations of foreign ministers (in 1790) under General Washington, that they should be permanent, and, as such, ministers and consuls were at once, and have continued to be since, appointed, I shall take it for granted that their existence was wisely provided.

I wish simply to call the attention of members to some of the most striking evils in the machinery of our foreign intercourse, and I shall indicate, without arguing, the remedies proposed for them in the bill before the House.

The first great evil results from our having originally adopted, in 1789, with very little modification, the foreign system of the English Government.

It was the growth of institutions directly opposed in principle to our own, and its peculiarities, ill-adapted to the nature of our Government at its origin, have grown with our development into great and positive evils.

The grade of diplomatic rank was artificial and involved.

It required an expensive provision of outfit entirely unsuited to our institutions.

Its salaries were left chiefly to the discretion of the Executive.

It was without proper guards upon the action of ministers; and, as the foreign policy of the British Government was under the control of the Sovereign, so, on our adopting its machinery, a larger share of influence and discretion was imposed by it upon the Executive of this country than was consistent with the theory of our Government. On the acknowledgment of the national existence of the United States by the treaty of 1783, there was no full and unequivocal expression of our national rights. It was not until after the dissolution of the Confederation, and the adoption of our present Constitution—1789—that even a commercial treaty could be formed with England.

Before that time she was not even represented here by a minister. In fact, it was long after that date before we can be said to have had any existence, except by sufferance, as an independent nation. The position our Government was to occupy among the other Governments of the world was undetermined; the rights of our citizens were continually violated, and our commerce depredated upon and driven from the sea. It was only when we had fought ourselves into respect through the war of 1812 that these rights were practically recognized. That this was the case is not remarkable. The domestic policy of a Government is always most seen and felt in the homes and business of men. Its foreign policy, although often almost as important, seems more remote.

The great interest, therefore, Mr. Speaker, felt at the formation of our Government in adjusting internal affairs, and the establishment of the Constitution, as a kind of international law between the States themselves, diverted attention from the importance of a well regulated system of intercourse with foreign nations; while the general confidence reposed in the moderation and good sense of General Washington, who was then President, checked all disposition to question the amount of power left to be exercised at his discretion. Thus, sir, while our Constitution, differing from the British Government, divided between the Executive and the Senate the control of foreign affairs, our early legislation conferred upon the President a degree of discretion over foreign intercourse more in accordance with the spirit of the English than of our own Government.

The second article of the second section of the Constitution provided for such intercourse by declaring that the President "shall have power, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to make treaties, provided two thirds of the Senators present concur; and he shall nominate, and, by and with the consent of the Senate, shall appoint embassadors, other public ministers, and consuls," &c., &c.

By this provision ministers and consuls were not created, but referred to as existing agents of international intercourse, under the law of nations.

The foreign policy of the English Government had been always, and is still, under the direction of the Executive; that of the United States by the framers of the Constitution was divided between the Executive and the Senate.

The Constitution went into operation on the 4th of March, 1789. The first Executive session was held on the 25th May, 1789, and to it General Washington proposed the regulation, by treaty with France, of the functions and prerogatives of consuls.

On the 16th of June, 1789, William Short was nominated and confirmed minister to France, in place of Mr. Jefferson, who desired to return.

On July 27, 1789, Congress established a Department and Secretary of Foreign Affairs, which, on the 12th of December of the same year, was changed into the present Department and Secretary of State.

The Secretary of this Department was to be appointed by the President, and to correspond with our consuls and ministers, and attend "to such other matters respecting foreign affairs" as the President should assign to his Department. On the 22d December, 1791, Pinckney, of South Carolina, was nominated by General Washington minister to London, and Gouveneur Morris, of New York, minister to Paris.

It was upon these nominations that the Senate discussed the policy of permanent over special missions to foreign courts, common under the Confederation. Permanent missions were preferred, and Pinckney and Morris confirmed.

The first act of Congress, after the formation of the Government, making appropriation for diplomatic intercourse, was passed July 1, 1790.

It authorized the President to draw from the Treasury an annual sum, not exceeding $40,000, for the support and incidental expenses of such persons as he should commission in the foreign service.

The amount of salary to be paid each was left to the President's discretion, except that (exclusive of outfit, which was not to be more than one year's salary) no minister plenipotentiary should be paid more than $9,000, nor a chargé more than $4,500, nor the secretary of the minister more than $1,350.

The salaries and outfits continued unchanged until May 1, 1810, when Congress raised the allowance for salary to the secretary of any legation from $1,350 to $2,000, and confined the allowance for outfit to minister plenipotentiary or chargés on going from the United States to any foreign country.

General Washington exercised the power granted by Congress, and appointed ministers and consuls abroad, with the highest salaries permitted by law. Having lived under the English diplomatic and consular systems, they were followed in their appointments in rank, except that no embassador was sent or received.

The term embassador, in diplomatic language, describes the personal representative of a sovereign, and differs from a mere minister in that the latter represents his nation.

The actual diplomatic grades were: minister plenipotentiary and envoy extraordinary, minister resident, and chargé d'affaires, with secretaries for each legation.

In 1802, under Mr. Jefferson, these systems had been in existence a little more than ten years, and comprehended ministers plenipotentiary to France, England, Madrid, Portugal, and a secretary to each legation—four ministers plenipotentiary, and four secretaries of legation.

A minister resident and a secretary of legation to the Hague—one minister resident, and one secretary of legation.

There were at the same time in service abroad two sets of commissions, under the sixth and seventh articles of the treaty with Great Britain, with an agent attached; making in diplomatic service eighteen persons.

There were consuls general at Amsterdam, Algiers, Tunis, Tripoli, and Morocco—five consuls general.

Two agents for the relief of American seamen; one at London, and the other at Kingston, Jamaica—two agents.

There were fifty-one consuls, three vice consuls, and four commercial agents in the consular service—sixty-five persons.

Making, in the foreign service of the Government abroad, in all, eighty-three persons.

Total expense of their salaries, $105,597 17.

The consuls general were salaried; consuls, and vice consuls, and commercial agents were supported by fees.

From 1800 to the present time our diplomatic and consular systems have remained without important modifications. In that period we have made great advances in wealth and power.

Such has been the development, in fifty years, of the interests particularly affected by our foreign intercourse. My time will not permit me to enlarge on particular points; but I call attention to the fact—

1. That coming into existence the first great neutral Power of the earth, with political institutions antagonist in principle to those of other Governments, we adopted their machinery for foreign intercourse; and that, during a period of sixty-five years, (three political generations,) we have maintained it without important modification.

2. That within the same period other Governments, with whom we hold intercourse, have greatly modified their systems; and Great Britain, whose system we more particularly copied, has several times (in 1815, '16, '25, '30, '31, and '50) thoroughly revised and changed hers in many important particulars, so as to have it conform to the requirements of the age.

3. That every President of the United States for the last thirty years has been embarrassed by the defects of our foreign system; that every Secretary of State during that period has desired its reorganization; and that almost every Congress, through regular and special committees, has reported in favor of its establishment upon a new basis.

4. That the commercial interest of the country has repeatedly protested against the incompatibility of many of its provisions, and their utter inadequacy to meet the wants of our extended trade; that the captains and seamen of our vessels abroad have constantly complained of its unequal and oppressive operation; and that our ministers and consuls, under Whig and Democratic Administrations—those in the actual and those in the past service of the country—have united in its condemnation.

5. That at many Governments where we are represented our ministers have been without right of admittance to the royal presence, and forced to yield in dignity and position to the representatives of petty and comparatively insignificant States, from the simple circumstance of our not having adopted the grades of diplomatic rank established at the treaty of Vienna, in 1815, and followed by all the other Governments of Europe—a modification simplifying diplomatic grades, and involving no sacrifice of principle or increased expenditure.

6. That while those of our ministers who accept diplomatic position merely for the sake of foreign travel, and who remain abroad only so long as the novelty of the life charms, and return home before they have acquired a knowledge of the language or a familiarity with the public men and feeling of the nation to which they have been accredited, are extravagantly paid in salary and outfit, (equal to $21,000 for a single year abroad,) others, of the same grade and to the same court—whose services, from a longer residence abroad and a more intimate knowledge of foreign matters, may be supposed to be of at least equal value—receive at the rate of only $9,000 a year.

7. That while some of our consuls amass fortunes, making, in some instances, from $9,000 to $20,000 a year, others, at points of much importance, are struggling on with a very bare support.

8. That with commerce spreading into every sea, and citizens establishing themselves in trade upon almost every coast the world round, and with legal provision for their protection, the agency for its execution is so defective as to make our law but little more, in many cases, than an instrument in the hands of citizens of foreign countries for our injury.

These evils, the committee have thought, originate chiefly in two causes:

First. Our having adopted a system cumbersome in its details, and unsuited to the nature of our institutions from the degree of discretion conferred upon the Executive.

Second. In our having retained this system as originally adopted, without modifying it to meet either the requirements of our development or the changed spirit of the age.

I am not insensible, Mr. Speaker, of the difficulties with which the committee have to contend in effecting the reforms proposed by the bill they have reported.

I am aware that the very just and popular prejudice which exists against any change in the cautious and wise system of foreign policy inaugurated under the administration of General Washington attaches, in some degree, to any change, even in the machinery of our foreign service.

I am aware that the subject of the reform itself is peculiarly within the district of no member on this floor, and that it is in the power of any one, either from design or ignorance, to distort its provisions in a way to excite vulgar clamor.

I am also aware, sir, that there are individuals of influence and respectability in the consular service to whose pecuniary interest it is that this bill should not pass. But for these very reasons I expect to find support for the bill in the good sense and reflection of members of the House.

The committee has desired to shape its provisions in strict accordance with our existing foreign policy, and in the arrangement of its details it has been governed by principles of general application. In no instance is the committee aware of having been influenced by the private interests of any individual.

The bill appears to be a long one; but, in reality, it is not long. The changes proposed would not, if brought together, cover more than four of the twenty-three printed pages of the bill. One great evil at the present time is, that the law of our consular and diplomatic service is scattered in various separate provisions all through our statute-books.

The present bill is a compilation of existing laws, placed in proper connection, to render plain the few modifications proposed.* It simplifies their duties, and makes ministers and consuls respond more nearly to the purpose of their creation. It takes from them any other character than that of representatives of their country, clothed with the influence and responsibilities properly belonging to such a position. It throws around them additional guards for the faithful discharge of official duty, and relieves them from temptation to sacrifice the public to private interests. It provides for them regular and economical support in a way that, freeing them from the distrust and suspicion of personal gain in the transaction of public business, either with foreign authorities or our own citizens, is, at the same time, little burdensome upon the Treasury, and equal and just in its operation upon different interests.

* The sections of this now substantially in force, either by law or the instructions of the State or Treasury Department, are:

Sections 9 and 10.—See circular instructions to diplomatic agents, secretaries of legation, and consuls, June 1, 1853.

Section 11, to line 6, 1 Statutes at Large, 256, to line 9; Instructions in Supplement to General Instructions to Consuls, (note,) page 36, to line 14; Law or Instructions, 1 Statutes at Large, 256; General Instructions, chapter I, article 1. The remainder of this section, General Instructions, chapter II, article 2.

Section 12.—In respect to making returns of fees at stated times, General Instructions, chapter III, article 12, and Circular Instructions, June 1, 1853.

Section 13.—Circular Instructions, June 1, 1853.

Section 15.—Law or Instructions, 2 Statutes at Large, 204; 5 Statutes at Large, 395; Circular, June 16, 1849; Circular, November 28, 1851; General Instructions, chapter IV, article 32.

Section 16.—General Instructions, chapter IV, article 34, and Circular, November 28, 1851.

Sections 17 and 18.—Substantially the same as provisions of existing law, 5 Statutes at Large, 395, 396, 397.

Section 21.—1 Statutes at Large, 255, 256; General Instructions, chapter IV, section 2, section 23; General Instructions, chapter III; Circular, June 1, 1853.

Section 23.—General Instructions, chapter II.

The changes under the bill may be briefly stated:

1. It abolishes the title of chargé d'affaires, raising all our diplomatic agents to the rank of ministers plenipotentiary, and simplifying our grades to correspond with the nature of our institutions and the systems of international intercourse adopted by the Governments of Europe in 1815, at the treaty of Vienna.

2. It abolishes the outfit, equal to one year's salary, and a return allowance of three months' salary to every minister on his going to and returning from his mission, and provides salaries proportioned to the expense and dignity of the different positions.

3. It provides a secretary of legation for each mission.

4. The salaries of none of our diplomatic or consular agents are to begin until after entering upon the discharge of their official duties, and to cease as soon as relieved of them by a successor.

5. It prohibits the absence of any minister from the country to which he is accredited, or any consular or commercial agent from his district, for a longer period than ten days, without leave from the President, and stops their salary for any absence over ten days, with or without leave of absence.

6. None but citizens of the United States are to be appointed to diplomatic or consular positions, or employed as clerks, or have access to the archives of our foreign offices.

7. Consuls at all the principal ports are prohibited from transacting any business, either in their own name or through the agency of other persons.

8. It substitutes fixed salaries for fees to consular and commercial agents; abolishes fees for passports, and all commissions upon money advanced as wages, or for the relief of seamen in distress; changes, in many particulars, and reduces, the tariff of fees and commissions for other consular acts; defines, with more precision, the duties of consuls in the settlement of the estates of persons dying abroad; abolishes all sub-agents and vice consuls, and provides for the accounting for all fees and commissions to the Government to be used as a general fund to assist in paying consular salaries.

1. The bill abolishes the title of chargé d'affaires, and raises all our diplomatic agents to the rank of ministers plenipotentiary.

The congress of European Powers that met at Vienna on the settlement of peace in Europe, agreed upon a grade of diplomatic rank which, when generally adopted, should prevent all embarrassments of etiquette in the conduct of future negotiations. We were not a party to that congress, and have never modified our system to correspond to the grades of diplomacy then established. The consequence has been, that at many of the European Courts our ministers have never been admitted to the presence of the sovereign except as a favor; and on public and State occasions, and in the transaction of business, and in the paying and receiving of visits, the representatives of the smaller Courts of Europe have had precedence over them.

The grades, as established by the Congress of Vienna, and amended by that of Aix-la-Chapelle, and at present recognized by European nations, are—

1. Embassador.
2. Envoys, ministers, or others accredited to sovereigns.
3. Minister resident.
4. Chargés d'affaires, accredited to the minister of foreign affairs, and secretaries of legation.

Embassador, in diplomatic language, is the representative of the person of a sovereign, and in this differs from a mere minister, who represents the nation. The bill raises all our missions to the grade of envoys extraordinary and ministers plenipotentiary. This change involves no sacrifice of principles, nor additional expenditure. Representatives, with but one exception, below this grade are considered as accredited to the minister of the foreign department, and not to the sovereign of the State. It is a distinction that, in point of fact, is recognized in the reception of ministers from foreign States by our own Government, and there is no reason why the embarrassment under which the present system places our own ministers abroad should not be removed.

Foreign ministers exist, and their rights, duties, and powers are determined by general assent and the laws of nations. They are the necessary agents of communication between Governments. They represent the disposition and interest of one Government to the ruling power of another Government. Under instructions, they negotiate treaties of commerce, give information about our laws, and in every way are expected, by the cultivation of friendly relations and good understanding, to exert themselves to preserve peace. Under such circumstances, they should be free from all unnecessary embarrassment. If engaged in important negotiations, the good will of the ruler will greatly facilitate them, and this is best secured by personal intercourse. Under the bill, if adopted, this advantage will be secured, and our diplomatic grades at the same time simplified to the nature of our institutions. A law passed last year enabled all our representatives of the grade of chargé to be accredited as ministers resident. This bill, by establishing but one rank for all, that of ministers plenipotentiary, will cause that, wherever we send a representative, he shall be recognized as the equal of the representative of any other country, and that under no possible circumstance can his rank be made an obstacle to his influence.

2. Secretaries of legation are provided for each mission.

The business transacted at some of our legations makes absolutely necessary an assistant of the minister. The increased travel of Americans abroad has made the giving and receiving of passports alone almost occupation for one man. The inquiry into the right to issue, in particular instances, these badges of citizenship; the examination of cases of wrong to American citizens, and the obtaining of redress; the preparation of information as to our local law and the customs of our ports, &c., &c., in reply to inquiries from the foreign Government, and various calls upon his attention; besides the preparation of weekly dispatches, require more time and labor than are always at the disposal of the minister—called to act in a private matter, frequently, at the very moment when engaged in perfecting some important treaty or negotiation under the law of nations.

Through the want of secretaries of legations in 1830, there was scarcely an American legation abroad with a complete record of its negotiations, and our representatives were obliged to send home to the State Department for information as to what their predecessors had done in particular matters, or rely upon information from the Governments with which they were in communication.

Nearly all the great Powers of Europe own hotels or residences for their representatives in the capitals of the countries to which they are accredited, and have attached to each legation one or more secretaries, whose especial business is to guard its archives. England and France have several of these attachés to nearly all their missions.

It is not proposed that the United States purchase residences for their ministers abroad, nor is it deemed advisable by the committee, but it is deemed highly important that there be a secretary to each legation. From the want of such heretofore it has happened, in some instances, that papers belonging to the United States Government have fallen into the hands of foreigners, and thus passed into the possession of the Government with which we were negotiating, causing serious embarrassment. We have already secretaries of legation to several of our missions. The bill proposes one, with a small salary, at each.

3. The bill abolishes all outfits and infits, and provides, instead, salaries proportioned to the expense and dignity of the several missions. A provision for outfit and infit was originally made in imitation of the display that characterized the diplomacy of Europe. Court etiquette and State ceremony formerly occupied a great portion of the diplomatist's time. Cabinet secrets were confined to the few, and the giving of presents, and costly display in dress and living, were recognized as legitimate and practical modes of influence. At the foundation of our Government, therefore, these appendages may have been wisely provided for as adding to the dignity and influence of our foreign ministers. The means of travel were then more tedious and expensive. From Washington to London, by the best and most expeditious means of conveyance, costs now not more than $170; to Paris, $200; to Berlin, $250; to Vienna, $300; and less than this to most of the other European capitals. There did not then exist, at the different courts of Europe, the same facilities for elegance and comfort in a temporary residence, and embassadors from one country to another were obliged either to carry these with them or to incur great expense in their purchase. Outfits and infits for foreign ministers were, for these reasons, furnished by all the Governments of Europe. Within the last sixty-five years, however, great changes have taken place in these respects in all the European States.

In illustration of the feeling of the day I would recall to the recollection of the House the great embarrassment experienced by Congress in 1778, on the reception of M. Gerard, the first French minister. The subject was referred to a committee, composed of Richard Henry Lee, Samuel Adams, and Gouverneur Morris, whose report on the subject, turning on mere points of etiquette, was discussed for five days. In the end he was received with a degree of formality that cannot be read without a smile. After providing that he should be called on by two members of Congress, the programme of his reception continues:

"At the time he is to receive his audience, the two members shall again wait upon him in a coach belonging to the States, and the person first named of the two shall return with the minister plenipotentiary, or envoy, in the coach, giving the minister the right hand, and placing himself on the left, with the other member on the first seat. When the minister plenipotentiary or envoy is arrived at the door of the Congress Hall, he shall be introduced to his chair by the two members, who shall stand at his left hand. When the minister is introduced to his chair by the two members, he shall sit down. His secretary shall then deliver to the President the letter of his sovereign, which shall be read and translated by the secretary of Congress. Then the minister shall be announced, at which time the President, the House, and the minister shall rise together. The minister shall then bow to the President and the House, and they to him. The minister and the President shall then bow to each other and be seated, after which the House shall sit down. The minister shall deliver his speech standing. The President and House shall sit while the minister is delivering his speech. The House shall rise, and the President shall deliver the answer standing. The minister shall stand while the President delivers his answer. Having spoken and being answered, the minister and President shall bow to each other, at which time the House shall bow, and then the minister shall be conducted home in the manner in which he was brought to the House."

But a short time before this, Silas Dean, our minister at Paris, wrote home from France to Congress for some of the natural products of the country, to be given, by way of influence, as presents to the Queen. He said in his letter, speaking of Marie Antoinette:

"December 3, 1776.—The Queen is fond of parade, and, I believe, wishes for war, and is our friend. She loves riding on horseback. Could you send me a fine Narragansett horse or two? The money would be well laid out. Rittenhouse's aviary, or Arnold's collection of insects, a phaeton of American make, and a pair of bay horses, a few barrels of apples, walnuts, cranberries, butternuts, &c., would be great curiosities."

During General Washington's administration, presents of form were given to foreign ministers—generally a chain and medal of gold; and there yet exists a letter of Jefferson's, dated New York, April 30, 1790, written to Paris, directing the manner in which the medal was to be cast. He desired it inscribed with "peace and commerce," and "the date of the republic." We are accustomed to speak of the simplicity of these early days without very exact ideas of what this simplicity consisted in; but, long after Mr. Jefferson's time, the circular from the State Department to our foreign ministers informed them that, with certain "papers, books and documents," necessary or useful in the discharge of their mission, they would receive "an engraved design of the uniform worn by the ministers of the United States at foreign courts on occasions when full dress is required," and that the expense of "presents to the menial attendants at court, and of the public functionaries," at their presentation, and on other established occasions, "usually Christmas and New Year's day," would be allowed as contingencies by the Department.

There exist to this time, in the State Department, plates showing the pattern of dress, and amount of gold embroidery and lace, to be worn by our ministers abroad, and its various modifications under different Administrations. (See note 1.)

Diplomacy and the spirit of the age have, in a great degree, outgrown all this, and a foreign minister is not now so much the Court congratulator as the business agent of his Government; and it is more his exact knowledge of the progress and development of the trade and material interest of his country, and the history of its law and legislation, as affecting other countries, and indicating the spirit and tendency of public opinion at home, that gives him influence, than the costliness of his living, or the degree of luster he can contribute to the brilliancy of Court displays.

The provision, therefore, for outfits and infits, does not now accord either with the changed spirit of diplomacy or the principles upon which our other public servants are compensated; it pays for services before they are performed. No longer necessary for its original purpose, it is often expended in the payment of debts contracted before going abroad, and thus serves only to make unequal the salaries of ministers, and, in a degree, to demoralize the whole diplomatic system. A minister plenipotentiary, under our present system, appointed to represent us abroad, if he remains at his post but a single day, is still entitled to his outfit of $9,000; if he remains but one year, he receives $20,250. In practice, it has been that a person who is thus appointed remains two years, draws an outfit of $9,000, a salary for two years of $18,000, and an infit of $2,250, making, in all, near $30,000 for two years—equal to a salary of about $15,000 a year—and then returns home to be succeeded by another, who pursues the same course. Where there is an exception to this, and one is suffered to remain abroad, irrespective of party changes, from his superior fitness to represent the country, deprived of the advantage of this outfit—recurring every few years—he struggles on with an inadequate salary, and in the end returns in embarrassed circumstances.

A MEMBER. Will you point to that portion of the bill which abolishes outfits?

Mr. PERKINS. I thank the gentleman for putting the inquiry. In the opinion of the committee, the establishment of the regular salaries in the bill abolished outfits. They now exist at the discretion of the President. It is a singular circumstance that the first appropriation for foreign services ($40,000) was placed at the disposal of General Washington without any limitation, except that outfits and salaries were not to exceed $9,000. It was at his discretion whether they should or should not exist. The committee, however, anticipating the objection now made, has introduced a section in these words:

And be it further enacted, That the acts, or parts of acts, authorizing the payment to ministers, consuls of the United States, of salaries, outfits and infits, clerk hire, and office rent, be, and the same are hereby, repealed.

A MEMBER. That is not in the printed bill.

Mr. PERKINS. It is in the copy which is in the Clerk's possession. The effect of the allowance of outfit, when no longer required, has been to prejudice the popular mind against our ministers abroad, in the idea that they are favored pensioners of a party Executive; and, in point of fact, we may admit on both sides of the House that these appointments have been too often conferred simply as the reward of partisan service; and that this circumstance, and the defects in the existing system which I have pointed out, have contributed to make what, in our foreign service, should be the distinct expression of national interest the mere expression of Executive favor.

From 1800 to 1822 one third of the entire expense of the foreign service of the United States was for outfits, infits, and contingencies.

From 1840 to 1852 (twelve years) the diplomatic expenses of the Government were $3,656,202. Of this amount one sixth was expended alone in outfits. In one Administration, a single individual drew—and he drew it rightfully, under existing rules—$22,000 in outfits. The committee have thought that this was an evil which should be remedied, and it is accordingly abolished by the bill. Salaries liberal, but not extravagant, are provided for all our ministers. The amount for each has been made to correspond, as nearly as possible, to the importance and amount of duties to be performed, and the necessary expense of getting to, and residing at, the mission. Our diplomatic establishment, if remodeled as proposed, will cost about $50,000 less than has been its average cost for the last ten years. It will place our foreign ministers on a more respectable footing abroad. It will make their salaries definite, and save greatly to the Treasury by preventing their outlay reaching anything like the amount possible in extra charges, and in the frequent resignation and recall of ministers under our present system. (See note 2.)

4. The bill further provides that the salary of representatives abroad shall not begin until after their arrival and actual entry upon the duties of their post, and that they shall cease so soon as they are relieved from those duties by a successor. It has been the custom heretofore for salaries to begin the day the commission has been received. By this means, a minister appointed abroad and not starting immediately on the receipt of his commission, or, if starting, who has delayed on his way, has been in the habit of drawing salary up to the time of his relieving his successor. Thus, in addition to the evil of outfits, has been added that of the overlapping of salaries, by which two persons have received pay at the same time for the same service; for the actual minister abroad, who has been recalled or has resigned, continues of right to discharge the duties of the office, and although the Government may decline to enter upon negotiations with him, as his successor has been appointed, still he draws salary, and is really minister until the arrival of his successor. It has been computed that, on an average, the ministers appointed from this country abroad do not reach their post until near four months after the date of their commission. (See note 3.) If he is at Washington, he visits his home, makes his preparation, and then returns to Washington for instructions before starting on his mission. By the bill this double payment of services not rendered is prevented. The salary of the new minister is to begin only when he enters upon the duties of his office, and the salary of his predecessor ceases.

5. It is further provided that no minister shall be absent from the country to which he is accredited for more than ten days at a time without the permission of the President, and that, if absent longer than that period, even by permission, his salary shall cease during such absence. The importance of this provision will impress itself upon every one familiar with the past or recent history of our missions abroad. By making their salary dependent upon their actual residence in the country to which they are sent, the bill puts it out of the power of the President to confer what is sometimes called a roving commission, with nominal appointment to a particular point, but with the general privilege of traveling over Europe at the expense of the Government. Under it, it is to be hoped, we will hear no more of United States ministers to Russia spending their winter in Italy, nor will there be distrust abroad and disquiet at home, occasioned by our ministers collecting at Paris from all the European capitals. The presence of the minister is insured at the point where he has duties to discharge. It is considered that these duties require his presence in the country to which he is accredited, and that he may only legitimately extend his travels to the entire extent of that country. When he goes beyond its limits for more than ten days, it is presumed that he is without the line of official duty, and his salary ceases until his return.

The bill further provides for the location of the office of legation at a central and convenient place in the capital of the country, and that it shall be kept open daily during business hours, except on Sundays and holidays. It guards against abuse by denying to consuls and commercial agents in capitals where the legation of the United States exists the right to grant or verify passports, except in the absence of our diplomatic representatives, and takes from either the right to exact a fee for this service.

It further provides that no one who is not a citizen of the United States and resident therein, or who shall be employed abroad in the service of the Government at the time of his appointment, shall be eligible as representative abroad. By this means it seeks to make our representative national both in character and sentiment.

It is unnecessary to enlarge upon any of these features of the bill. They commend themselves to adoption on statement, and correct defects in our present diplomatic system universally acknowledged. I doubt if there is any one present who does not acquiesce in their importance. I now come, Mr. Speaker, to the consular part of the bill.

Mr. ORR, (interrupting.) Before the gentleman leaves the point he is now on, I desire to ask him what will be the comparative expense of the new system with that of the old or existing system?

Mr. PERKINS. I intended, before concluding my remarks, to give the financial aspect of the bill; but as the gentleman has called my attention to it, I will give it now.

Mr. ORR. I do not wish to interfere with the gentleman's course of remark.

Mr. PERKINS. In the year 1850 the entire expenditure of the country for its foreign diplomatic service, was about $397,314. The salaries proposed to be given by this bill will amount to about $322,000, making a saving on that year of about $75,000. The bill will accomplish this by a curtailment of the abuses of which I have spoken. I have here an estimate, with calculations attached, which I could read to the House, but I doubt whether it would at all simplify my explanation; I announce only the result. (See note 4.)

Mr. SKELTON. I rise to ask a question of the honorable gentleman from Louisiana. This expenditure which he has stated to the House includes, I presume, other expenditures besides the regular salaries and outfits. Does it not?

Mr. PERKINS. I am thankful to the gentleman from New Jersey for bringing to my mind a single estimate in this expense, which will illustrate to the House the necessity of the reform. I have said that, at the foundation of the Government, the only appropriation for foreign service was $40,000. Yet, for the want of the definite rules provided by this bill, everything being left to the discretion of the Executive, whatever the emergency of one moment has called for or justified under one Administration has been a sufficient justification for the same outlay under the next; and thus, from time to time, from the first simple expenditure, everything is now indefinite, and the Secretary of State may justify almost any expenditure. Thus we have a $40,000 contingent fund for foreign missions, $40,000 contingent fund for foreign intercourse, and I do not know how many other estimates that I might enumerate in the same way. Mr. Speaker, I am opposed to this system of discretion and secret service money. It is contrary to the genius of our institutions. It defies all responsibility, and leads to certain abuse. This bill excludes, and makes unnecessary, the estimate for foreign missions; thus cutting off, in one item, $40,000. In this way is made the saving to which I have called the attention of the House.

In the allotment of salaries under the bill, it cannot be expected, Mr. Speaker, that all will agree exactly on the propriety of any fixed sum for a particular post.

The committee have desired to act in this matter in the nature of a jury. The testimony of those who have been abroad, in private and public position, has been taken, and tested by the personal experience of those members of the committee who have themselves been abroad. Reference has been had to the graduated expense of different posts under the English and French Governments, and to the voluminous testimony of those in the foreign service of the English Government, taken before a committee of retrenchment of the House of Parliament, in 1850, of which Cobden and Bright were members. Numerous letters have also been received from those in the service. It was desired that the salaries should be liberal, but not extravagant, and correspond to the responsibilities incurred, the amount of labor to be performed, and the necessary expense of getting to, and residing at, any post.

It is impossible to take up each item and discuss it before the House; but I will state generally, that the actual salaries of the bill are nearly one fourth less than those paid by the English Government, and one third less than those paid by the French Government, to the same positions, without calculating the expense for house-rent, &c., furnished their ministers by those Governments. (See note 5.)

There was, in the early history of the country, no fixed compensation for foreign ministers. In 1779 (£2,500) $12,500 was established as the salary for the minister to Paris, and (£1,000) $5,000 for the secretaries of legation.

This continued until 1784, when Congress declared that salaries should not exceed $9,000; and this rule was followed, adding an outfit, after the adoption of the Constitution.

The Confederation paid its ministers better than we have done since, although the expense of living, with the depreciation of the value of the precious metals, has greatly increased.

From a report of the Secretary (Mr. Morris) of Foreign Affairs, and Du Ponceau, assistant secretary, made to Congress in 1782, it appears that Mr. Franklin, Mr. Jay, and Mr. Adams, each received in that year $11,111 and a fraction salary as ministers abroad.

The salaries under the bill, although an increase upon existing salaries, secure a saving of actual expenditure to the Treasury each year of about $50,000, by cutting off extra charges, overlapping of salaries, outfits, infits, contingencies, &c.

I now proceed with the consular portion of the bill. It has been asked, why attach to a diplomatic bill a consular reform? The reasons, sir, were obvious to the Committee on Foreign Affairs. The evils of both systems are alike. At present there is no law regulating the charges of either consular or diplomatic agents, nor has it been possible for the committee to say when those charges are within rules and precedents. One Secretary of State justifies one and another another.

The consular system is a portion of the foreign service, and, therefore, properly attached to a bill to regulate the foreign service. Consuls are appointed in the same way as the foreign ministers, by the Executive, and confirmed by the Senate. They report alike to the State Department. The reforms that affect the diplomatic service, affect, to a certain degree, the consular service. The evils of each have the same origin. We copied from England their consular system, as we copied from England their diplomatic system. We have retained it without modification.

One reform of this bill, which operates equally upon diplomatists and consuls, to which I especially invite the attention of the House, is, that heretofore there has been nothing to prevent the Executive from commissioning to act as a foreign agent of this Government the citizen of another Government. A person, for instance, in the employ of Austria—an Austrian subject—may not only hold the commission of this Government in Vienna, and discharge the duties of American consul, but, in the absence of our minister there, actually represent us at that Court. In point of fact, this happened in 1849, at the very time we were sending a special and confidential minister to recognize the independence of Hungary. The majority of those in our consular service were at one time foreigners, and armed with power to tax, to almost an indefinite extent, American commerce and American citizens, in a manner most injurious to our interests, and of which I will speak when I come to the question of fees under this bill.

This bill proposes that no one but an American citizen shall be entitled to hold office under the Government in the foreign service. The provision retaining our ministers at their posts is made to apply also to consuls. Heretofore it has sometimes happened that an individual wishing to travel abroad, and with influence, has secured a foreign consulate. It gave him immunities and privileges. He met with a reception more honorable than he would have met as a citizen. There was no obligation upon him to remain at his commercial post. He might leave a foreign agent to discharge his duties; and, in point of fact, this has been frequently done; so that we might have a consul, for instance, at Liverpool, or Rio, or Havre, realizing $20,000 a year from the commerce of the country, in the way of fees, enjoying himself in foreign travel, while the duties were discharged by a foreigner. This bill provides that any consul who leaves his post for more than ten days at a time shall lose his salary during his absence. We thus require in the consular, as in the diplomatic service, that our officers shall remain at their posts.

At this point I should prefer, if it is agreeable to members, that the House should go into committee, and I will finish what I have to say on the consular part of the system to-morrow.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I hope the proposition of my friend will be acceded to. It is desirable that the bill should be printed with the additional sections which have not been printed. It can go into the Globe, and we can all see it to-morrow.

By general consent the bill was ordered to be printed.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I now move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The motion was agreed to.

NOTE 1.

From a French writer of the day, quoted by Lyman, we have the following description of Dr. Franklin's appearance at the French court:

"Franklin appeared at court in the dress of an American cultivator. His straight unpowdered hair, his round hat, his brown cloth coat, formed a contrast with the laced and embroidered coats and the powdered and perfumed heads of the courtiers of Versailles."

The costume worn by American representatives abroad, and the modifications to which it has been subjected at different periods of our history, will appear from the following extracts:

Mr. Gallatin, soon after his appointment as one of the commissioners to Ghent, wrote (April 22, 1813) to the State Department, inquiring if the President had intended to prescribe any uniform to be worn by our representatives abroad. If any was to be prescribed, he recommended that it should be as simple as possible, with very little lace, which was common in liveries, and without epaulets, which he thought should be exclusively for the Army and Navy. That, for his own part, he preferred a black coat to any uniform.

A uniform was determined upon, but seems never to have been prescribed. The State Department, after this date, usually sent, with his commission, to each newly appointed minister abroad, an engraved pattern of the dress he was recommended to wear on state occasions.

The following circular was issued under Mr. Monroe's administration:

Memorandum of the dress of an American Minister, as fixed by the mission to Ghent.

"A blue coat, lined with white silk, straight standing cape, embroidered with gold, single-breasted, or round button-holes, slightly embroidered; buttons plain, or, if they can be had, with the artillerist's eagle stamped upon them, (i. e. an eagle flying with a wreath in his mouth, and grasping lightning with one of its talons;) cuffs embroidered in the manner of the cape; white cassimere breeches, gold knee-buckles; white silk stockings, and gold or gilt shoe-buckles; a three-cornered chapeau de bras, not so large as those used by the French, nor so small as those of the English; a black cockade, to which lately an eagle has been attached; sword, &c., corresponding.

"On occasions of unusual ceremony the minister was to wear a coat similar to that above described, but embroidered round the skirts and down the breasts, as well as at the cuffs and cape, all the other parts of the dress remaining the same. The coats to be distinguished as the great and the small uniform. There should be a white ostrich feather or plumet in the minister's hat—not standing erect, but sewed round the brim."

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, November 6, 1817.

A Circular under Mr. Adams's administration.

"This uniform was adopted for the convenience of visiting in the same dress upon all necessary occasions and at every Court. The use of it is in no case prescribed by this Government, and every minister of the United States abroad may wear, at his discretion, any dress conformably with the customs of the place where he may reside. The engraved design furnished is, however, specially recommended, on account of the uniformity which it produces in the dress of our ministers abroad."

A circular under General Jackson's administration.

"WASHINGTON, November 2, 1829.

"The President has thought proper to adopt the following as the dress to be used by our ministers and other diplomatic agents upon all such occasions, which is recommended as well by its comparative cheapness as its adaptation to the simplicity of our institutions: A black coat with a gold star on each side of the collar, near its termination; the under-clothes to be black, blue, or white, at the option of the wearer; a three cornered chapeau de bras, a black cockade and eagle, and a steel mounted sword, with a white scabbard. It is to be understood, however, that the use of this particular dress is not prescribed by the President. It is suggested by his direction as an appropriate and convenient uniform dress for the use of ministers and other diplomatic agents of the United States."

From this date down to the issue of Mr. Marcy's circular on the subject, there was no further modification.

NOTE 2.

Appropriations made for extra services to individuals acting as ministers, chargés, commissioners, and secretaries of legation, in the following years:

In 1848	$17,344
In 1849	4,999
In 1850	7,675
In 1851	1,747
In 1852	15,825
In 1853	7,315
In 1854	22,000
Total for seven years	$77,105

Or about an average of $11,000 a year.

NOTE 4.

Expenses of the foreign service of the United States in 1850 were		$412,789 00
From this deduct $16,475 as consular expenses.		16,475 00
		396,314 00
Under the present bill, the expenses will be, for salaries to ministers and secretaries of legation	$311,500 00
Commissioner to Sandwich Islands, interpreter to China, and dragoman to Constantinople	11,000 00
		$73,814 00

But as this estimate is based upon the year 1850, the beginning of a new administration, I verify it by another calculation.

Six missions in Europe.

Ministers plenipotentiary, expense of one for one year—
Outfit	$9,000 00
Salary	9,000 00
Infit	2,250 00
Four months, or one third of a year, overlapping salary	3,000 00
	$22,250 00
If minister stays two years at his post, to	23,250 00
Add salary second year	9,000 00
	$32,250 00
Divide this by 2, and it leaves the salary for ministers under the present system, where two are appointed within fours years to any legation	$16,125 00
Where one remains four years, his salary for four years will be	$22,250 00
And $9,000 multiplied by three years	27,000 00
	$50,250 00
Divide this by 4, will be expense for a year	$12,562 50
Possible expense under present system, 4 times $23,250 make	$93,000 00
Where ministers appointed twice in four years, 4 times $16,125 makes	64,500 00
Where minister stays four years, 4 times $12,562 50 make	50,250 00
Multiply these sums each by 6, and we have the expense of the system as it is, at six missions.
The possible expense under present system	558,000 00
The ordinary and probable expense	387,000 00
The smallest possible expense	301,500 00

Expenses of Chargés in Europe under present system.

Chargé's expenses for one year—
Outfit	$4,500 00
Salary	4,500 00
Infit	1,125 00
Four months, or one third salary, overlapping	1,500 00
	$11,625 00
If chargé stays two years, add salary for one year	4,500 00
	$16,125 00
Divide this by 2, and it leaves the salary for chargé under the present system, where two are appointed in four years	8,062 50
Where one remains four years, salary for one year	$11,625 00
For four years (4,500 multiplied by 3) will be	13,500 00
	$25,125 00
Divided by 4, will be for one year under present system	$6,281 25
Possible expense under present system, 4 times $11,625 will be	$46,500 00
Where twice appointed in four years, 4 times $8,062 50 will be	32,250 00
Where stays four years, 4 times $6,281 25 will be	25,125 00
Multiply each of these sums by 10, and you will have the expense of the present chargéships in Europe.
Utmost possible expense under present system is	$465,000 00
The ordinary and probable expense is	322,500 00
The smallest possible expense is	251,250 00

Present System—Europe.

Under present system, least possible expense for four years of six missions in Europe	$301,500 00
Expense of ten chargéships, least possible	251,250 00
Five secretaries of legation, at $2,000 a year each, for four years	40,000 00
	$592,750 00
This sum divided by four, makes expense in Europe	$148,187 50

South America.

Least possible expense of five ministers (China and Mexico included) is	$251,250 00
And for seven chargés	175,875 00
	$427,125 00
Which sum divided by four gives	$106,781 25
To this add four secretaries of legation, at $2,000 each	8,000 00
Least possible expense of foreign service in South America under present system	$114,781 25

Present System.

Expense in Europe, (least possible)	$148,187 00
Expense in South America, (least possible)	114,781 00
	$262,968 00
To this add contingent of foreign missions	40,000 00
Average annual appropriation for extra services as charges, &c.	11,000 00
	$313,968 00

This calculation is based on the lowest possible expenditure under the present system, and in the idea of only one member being appointed to any Government within four years.

It is a small estimate to say there are, under each Administration of four years, two appointments at seven out of the twenty-eight missions—say two of these are full missions, and five are chargés, and we will have, in addition $52,000 00

Total annual expense $365,968 00

Expense under the bill for ministers will be $267,500 00

Secretary of legation ..... 44,000 00 — $311,500 00

Commissioner to Sandwich Islands $6,000 00

Interpreter to China 2,500 00

Dragoman to Turkey ..... 2,500 00 — 11,000 00

$322 500 00

An annual saving each year (under the bill) of $33,468 00

CONSULAR SYSTEM OF THE UNITED STATES.

OF LOUISIANA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

February 6, 1855.

The question being upon the bill to remodel the Diplomatic and Consular systems of the United States, reported from the Committee on Foreign Affairs by the gentleman from Louisiana, [Mr. PERKINS,] and upon which he was entitled to the floor—

Mr. PERKINS, of Louisiana, said:

Mr. SPEAKER: What I have now to say of our consular system is in continuation of my remarks on the bill reported from the Committee on Foreign Affairs for the reform of our consular and diplomatic systems.

The abuses under our consular system are even greater than those under our diplomatic system; and are of a character that demand immediate correction. They affect, injuriously, the honor of the country as well as its commercial interests, and bear with peculiar severity upon the American sailor.

I know the difficulty of interesting the House in a subject necessarily of so much detail as this reform. It is time, however, that it should be effected, and I earnestly ask the attention of members to a brief statement of the provisions of the bill before the House.

The diplomatic and consular reforms have been united in one bill, because they are both parts of our foreign service, both chiefly under the control of the State Department, and the defects in each chiefly result from the same causes—an originally imperfect organization, and the too close imitation of the English systems, retained for sixty-five years without important modification.

The powers of a consul, and the laws regulating his duty, can be considered, as they affect: First, his own country; second, the country to which he is sent; third, our foreign commerce; fourth, the rights of seamen; and, fifth, the revenue of the country as collected by imposts upon foreign importation. I will speak of each of these points; and, without attempting to discuss any one of them fully, I will indicate six or seven of the greatest of existing abuses, and state how far, and in what manner, it is proposed to correct them.

The diplomatic representative abroad is under the protection of the law of nations. If without any local law or positive instructions from his own Government, he has still certain great general principles common to all nations for his guidance.

The consul, on the other hand, does not exist by, nor derive his powers from, the law of nations. He is not, properly speaking, the representative of his country, but only of certain interests of his country. He is governed and protected by treaty stipulations, or special enactments. Any uncertainty, therefore, in the law regulating either his powers or his duties, leaves in great embarrassment all the interests under his control, and makes it of the utmost importance, not only that his duties be properly defined by the law of his own country, but that proper guards be placed upon their discharge. Under our present system, a United States consul presents an anomaly painful, and, at the same time, shameful to contemplate. Not necessarily a citizen of the United States, it often happens that he has never even visited this country, knows but little of our institutions, and speaks, if at all, but imperfectly our language. With no law regulating definitely his duties, and such statutes as exist, imperfect and difficult of access, scattered all through the numerous volumes of the acts of Congress, it is not surprising that the greatest abuses exist.

Mr. Speaker, I do not now refer to some mere abstract abuse. The nature and character of the duties of consuls, the extent and variety of subjects which command their attention, and generally the remoteness of their locality, and the utter helplessness of citizens abroad suffering, in person or property, to obtain protection, except through their agency, give to the provisions of our law regulating their conduct the highest degree of practical importance.

The consul, I have said, has duties to perform, both towards the country of which he is a resident and towards his own country. More than this, he is not only often the sole agent of communication between these Governments, but, from circumstances, he is frequently, at the same time, both the protector of his countrymen and a judge between them. It is his duty to guard the commercial interests of his country; to give notice of the infringement of treaties; to advise with and see that citizens of his Government are not imposed upon, or subjected to unnecessary demands in their business, and to be the organ through which their grievances are made known. Appointed to localities too remote to command the attention of the embassador, he is at once the peaceful sentinel of trade, and the legal advocate of the rights of his countrymen.

*The present bill embodies the provisions of existing law respecting consuls, and the instructions of the Government, which have the force of law, but which now vary, more or less, with every new Secretary of State. The changes proposed by it in our existing system are such as have been suggested by the experience of those connected with our foreign service. Mr. Livingston's report, in 1833, Mr. Buchanan's, in 1846, and numerous other reports from committees of this House, and from persons in the foreign service, and on file in the State Department, have all been consulted. The minor provisions of the bill have been subjected to the severest scrutiny, by those in positions making them most competent to decide upon them. The committee, in determining its details, have sought to be governed by principle and although there may be objection in the minds of some members of the House to this or that feature in the bill, or to the amount of salary for this or that consulate, I do not think, taken as a whole, that any bill could have been elaborated with more care. It will be impossible to discuss before the House all these items, and I have only said so much in order that members may see that the committee, in presenting for their adoption the present bill have not done so without giving to even its minutest details that reflection and study which the importance of the subject demands.

The most important reforms under the bill can be briefly stated.

First. None but citizens of the United States will, under its provisions, be enabled to hold consular positions abroad.

Second. The consul will be obliged to remain personally within his commercial district and discharge the duties of his office. His salary will not begin until his actual entry upon the discharge of these duties; and if absent longer than ten days at any one time from his commercial district, with or without the consent of the President, he will forfeit, during such absence, his salary.

Third. It simplifies the grades of consular rank, and curtails some abuses resulting from the number and mode of appointment of vice consuls, who have heretofore enjoyed the privileges of regular consuls, without furnishing any of the guarantees either of a pecuniary kind or of character exacted of those appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate.

Fourth. It denies to consuls at important points abroad, where there is much American trade, and their consular duties properly discharged should occupy their whole time, the right to engage in trade.

Fifth. It provides a salary for each consul, and defines precisely the fees to be collected, specifies their character and amount, and creates guards against extortion in their collection, or failure to account for them to the Government.

First. None but American citizens of the United States will, under the bill, be enabled to hold consular positions abroad.

I have already discussed this point, and will only confirm what I have said by the opinion of Mr. Jefferson, given in a letter to John Jay, dated Paris, November 14, 1788:

"With respect to consular appointments, it is a duty on me to add some observations, which my situation here has enabled me to make. I think it was in the spring of 1784, that Congress (harassed by multiplied applications from foreigners, of whom nothing was known but on their own information, or on that of others as unknown as themselves) came to a resolution that the interest of America would not permit the naming any person not a citizen to the office of consul, vice consul, agent, or commissary.

"This was intended as a general answer to that swarm of foreign pretenders. It appears to me that it will be best still to preserve a part of this regulation."

These views are confirmed by the experience of all who have since been connected with the service. By the bill they are made the law.

Second. The consul will be obliged, under the bill, to remain at his post and discharge the duties of his office. If absent longer than ten days at any one time from his commercial district, he will forfeit, during that absence, his salary. Persons will then no longer seek the position as enabling them to make the tour of Europe, or enjoy themselves abroad while their office is prostituted for gain, and its duties half-way discharged by hired substitutes. Consulships will be held for the interest of the country, and not for that of individuals. The importunity and influences now brought to bear upon the President, in granting leave of absence, will be checked. These are frequently of a character difficult to resist, and yet it is plainly the interest of the country, when an office is accepted in the foreign service, that its duties be personally discharged.

Third. We have now consul generals, consuls, vice consuls, and commercial agents.

The bill gets rid of many embarrassments, and simplifies this classification by establishing only consuls and commercial agents. In reality, the only difference between a consul general and a consul, is one of rank. A consul general ranks as a major in the Army, and a post captain in the Navy, and is received on an English vessel of war with the firing of nine guns. A consul ranks with a captain in the Army, and a commander in the Navy, and is received with the firing of seven guns. Their powers and their duties, except by special enactment, are the same.

Among semi-civilized people, as in Asia and Africa where the title is employed by other Governments as a means of influence, and really ministers to the interest of the nation, and not merely to the vanity of the individual, the President is authorized by the bill to confer the title of consul general. The designation, however, carries with it no additional power or salary.

Commercial agents are now appointed by the Government to certain countries, as to the colonies of Holland, where consuls will not be received, but where our commercial interests require protection. Their powers are less than those of consuls, and they do not possess the same immunities.

Vice consulates, as they now exist, are, by the bill, abolished. These positions have generally been filled by persons appointed by consuls to localities within their consular district, who, through it, have enjoyed the immunities of consuls, without any of the guarantees of character or capacity exacted of those appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate.

It has been charged that these appointments have been sold by some of our consuls, and it is not surprising that a foreigner, the subject of another Government, holding office as consul under our Government, with power to delegate his authority, should do so for a consideration. Offices in many of the countries of Europe are disposed of in this way.

In 1852 there were in Europe one hundred and twenty-five subjects of other Governments acting as American vice consuls, and in European colonies two hundred and twenty-five, making three hundred and fifty, exclusive of those in South America and the Pacific. These men exercised all the power of regular consuls. They granted American passports to almost whom they pleased, and taxed Americans and American commerce for their support in almost every imaginable form. Should I state the extent to which frauds upon the Treasury have been practiced under the consular office, as they have been described to me by those in positions making them cognizant of the facts, it would seem almost incredible.

A letter addressed to me on this subject, by one many years consul abroad—still acting as such—and noted for his intelligence and honesty, says:

"Within the last few years, innumerable passports have been granted, by these vice consuls, to persons not pretending to be Americans One United States vice consul told me he had himself signed three thousand, and that all in one year from his consulate was four thousand two hundred."

In the same connection he says:

"So many vile frauds have been practiced in granting passports, that, in some parts of Europe, the term is, you can be manufactured an American as low as fifty cents, or if of a higher fabric, for fifteen dollars to thirty dollars."

Mr. Speaker, of course I do not read this as true always, or everywhere in Europe; but that it may be, and has been, practiced under our present consular system, makes its reform a duty. As I am reading, I will give an extract which will apply to another branch of the subject. Of consuls leaving their posts he says:

"Seventeen ministers, consuls, attachés, and others, all passed through this city within the last quarter, not one on Government business, or with the permission of the Department."

This reminds me, Mr. Speaker, to read the instructions about dress to our consuls, in force up to the last few years. The permission to be decked as it describes, may explain, in part, the great demand that has existed for the position of a vice consul:

STATE DEPARTMENT, July 1, 1838.

ART. 47. The consular uniform (as prescribed by the circular from this Deparment, dated August 8, 1815, hereto annexed) must be worn on all visits of ceremony to the authorities of the place, and on all other proper occasions.

Circular.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, August 8, 1815.

The consular uniform, prescribed in the standing consular instructions, is abolished, and the following substituted, viz:

Single-breasted coat of blue cloth, with standing cape or collar, and ten navy buttons in front, one button on each side of the cape, four on each cuff, four under each pocket, and one on each hip and in the folds, two on each side, in the center, and one on each side of the same, at the lower extremities of the skirts.

The front, (from the cape down to the lower extremity of the skirts,) cuffs, cape, and pocket flaps, to be embroidered in gold, representing a vine composed of olive-leaves, and the button-holes to be worked with gold thread; the button-holes corresponding with the width of the embroidery, which is not to exceed two inches in any part.

Vest and small clothes of white, and navy buttons; the former to have ten in front, and four under each pocket flap. With this dress, a cocked hat, small sword, and shoes and buckles, are to be worn. The hat to be furnished with gold loop, gold tassels, and black cockade, with gold eagle in the center; added to which, it is to be understood that the mountings of the sword and shoe and knee buckles are to be gold; otherwise, gilt.

In such attire in this country one would only be laughed at; but at localities where rank is indicated by dress, and constitutes the ambition of life, you can imagine the satisfaction enjoyed by foreign vice consuls to the United States, in its parade on public occasions. It is worthy of note, that up to 1815, when Mr. Monroe was Secretary of State, consuls wore the United States naval uniform.* It would seem as if this circular about dress was prepared to prevent any subsequent confounding of a consul with a naval officer. Since the circular of Mr. Marcy consuls dress very much as they please.

Consuls may, under the bill, have assistants in their offices, but they must be American citizens; and for their conduct the consuls themselves are responsible. The Government will only correspond with and recognize the consul.

Fourth. The bill before the House prohibits consuls at all the principal ports from engaging in trade, either in their own names or the names of other persons.

There is nothing more opposed to the genius of our institutions than the custom, common under European Governments, of jobbing in the duties of office; and yet, in adopting the consular system of Great Britain, we fastened upon our Government many positive evils of this character.

Great Britain originally allowed all her consuls to engage in trade, and it was only on the protest of her commercial interest, that she finally took from them in part the right. Her rule now is, that consuls at important commercial points shall not engage in trade.

* CONSULAR UNIFORM WHEN MR. JEFFERSON WAS SECRETARY OF STATE.—The consuls and vice consuls of the United States are free to wear the uniform of their Navy, if they choose to do so. This is a deep blue coat, with red facings, lining, and cuffs; the cuffs slashed, and a standing collar; red waistcoat, (laced or not, at the election of the wearer,) and blue breeches; yellow buttons, with a foul anchor, and black cockades and small swords.—3 Jefferson's Works, 187, 188.

A general system of merchant consuls has been found not to answer, in the experience of other Governments, and has caused frequent and just complaint under our own Government, as giving undue advantages of trade to the consul over all other merchants at the same port. This advantage is so generally recognized that our consulships, except at certain points, where the consular duties give constant occupation, are mainly sought for on this account.

Before American consuls abroad the invoices of all shipments to this country on foreign account are, by law, required to be sworn. By this means the consul in trade obtains a knowledge, possessed by no one else, of the business of every merchant at his port who is engaged in American trade. By giving information in advance, if inclined, he can lessen greatly the profits of the commercial adventure of another, and, at the same time, regulate his own shipments from a knowledge of those of all the other merchants, so as to insure profitable returns. At some ports this has had such an effect in destroying trade, by creating its monopoly in the hands of the consul, that foreign Governments have refused to receive as consul any one engaged in trade. France and Prussia have both protested against receiving at certain ports an American consul engaged in trade. The experience of the English and other Governments has been, that the consul, occupied solely in the discharge of the duties of his office, exerts greater influence, and secures more respect, from the authorities, because more independent in his action, and free from the suspicion of private interests. His protests in behalf of the commercial rights of his countrymen are considered the result of a sense of official duty, and are not weakened in energy by the desire of personal favor or facilities in trade. His actions, too, give more satisfaction to his countrymen, because free from the suspicion of having rivals in business by whose losses he is to profit. In fact a consul's individual interest can only be thus truly identified with the commerce and just rights of his countrymen, the enforcement of law, and the honor of his nation.

The duties of a consul, however, are not only affected indirectly by his interest in trade, but often they are in such direct conflict as to make it almost impossible for the most conscientious of men to escape an insensible bias in their discharge. If, as a merchant, he expects consignments, it is his interest to conciliate the masters of vessels, and to do so he will look with a lenient eye upon their conduct towards seamen, whom it is his especial duty to protect. For example, if a master of a vessel at sea is guilty of inhuman conduct towards his men, or has with them a difficulty of any kind, it is his interest, of course, to conciliate the consul before whom, on his arrival at port, the matter is to be examined. If the consul is engaged in trade, he can do this by either consigning to him his vessel and cargo, or by giving to him the furnishing of supplies for vessel and men on his return voyage.

If the consul is a merchant, and engaged in exporting, he cannot himself swear to the truth of his own invoices.

It is his interest that invoices should be low, while it is that of the United States revenue that they be high.

His rivals in trade, too, are naturally desirous of concealing from him a knowledge of their business, and to avoid swearing their invoices before him, often interest with them in trade some one at the home port, to just sufficient amount to admit of their swearing on the representations of letters. By this means extensive frauds are committed upon the revenue, which it is almost impossible to detect. To prevent this, as, in addition to the commercial advantage, he gets two dollars for every invoice sworn before him, the consul is tempted to countenance invoices below their real value. By this means the honest importer at the home port finds it impossible to compete with the dishonest foreigner, and our trade is thrown into the hands of citizens of other Governments. Thus it is that, at this time, more than sixty per centum of our importations from Europe are on foreign account. But the instances of conflict of duty and interest in the case of a merchant consul are too numerous to be mentioned.

I must hasten on. There is constant temptation to fraud. If the consul is dishonest he is beyond the reach of public opinion, and the delay and difficulty of supplying testimony from a distant point, almost frees him from legal responsibility. If he is honest, he is constantly subjected to suspicion from the very parties over whom he is expected to exercise a moral influence. If he is unfortunate in trade, and bankruptcy ensue, it involves a loss of official influence, and, at many points, even a national degradation in exposure, under the local law, to imprisonment.

Great, however, as are the evils resulting from merchant consuls in time of peace, they are greatly aggravated in time of war.

The facility with which a merchant consul can cover up the property of belligerents by ostensibly owning American vessels, which, in fact, belong to foreigners, and the various ways by which, in the exercise even of the just right of his office, he excites the suspicion of foreign Powers, tends greatly to disturb the good understanding especially necessary at such a time.

It has been said by one of much experience, that "many of the difficulties and unpleasant occurrences which happened to our citizens abroad, and so much embarrassed our relations with foreign nations during the last continental war, might have been avoided, if, instead of consuls allowed to engage in trade, and rendering their official character subservient to its interests, we had followed the example of other nations, and by strictly forbidding them commercial pursuits, and confining them to the transaction of public duties, had secured for them the amount of consideration and influence which is never extended to the merchant consul."

Fifth. The bill further creates salaries for all consuls and commercial agents, and provides for the accounting for the payment of all fees and commissions into the public Treasury.

This provision is required by economy and the interest of trade. It is the policy of our Government that its offices be adequately salaried, without being made sinecures. With the English consular system we adopted the rule of fees and commissions. Great Britain now salaries the greater number of her consuls, while we retain her old system.

The effect has been only evil. Consulates are designed to be so many places of refuge scattered over the world for the protection of the persons and property of our citizens, but the present system makes them offices for individual gain, which, when no longer profitable, are thrown back vacant upon the country. The protection given by a consul to his countrymen, is an emanation of power from the Government at home, and is something due the citizen without price. In theory it cannot be bought or sold. The attaching of a fee to every consular act is inconsistent with this idea, and although originally designed for the support of the consul, has become an enormous tax upon commerce, securing great incomes to certain consulates, making sinecures for the reward of partisans, and leaving commerce and the revenue to suffer for the want of proper support for consuls at other points.

Whatever, however, might have been the justice originally of making the support of each consul to depend upon the fees of his office, the system now operates most unjustly both upon the consul and the commercial interest. When we had little or no commerce at any foreign port, there was no great inequality in making consuls depend upon their fees. But within the last sixty years, Liverpool has grown to be the great commercial city of the world—the whole of South America has risen up into independent States, and now, while the consulates, for example, at Liverpool and Rio, and at other points, yield from $10,000 to $20,000 a year, and are sought, and often bestowed, as rewards for partisan service, others, at very highly important points, are miserably paid. While these immense collections are made at some consulates, and go into the pockets of Executive favorites, the Government is actually paying out annually between $25,000 and $30,000 in salaries to consuls at points where there is but little commerce, but where they are positively required for the protection of the lives and property of American citizens, as in China, and the Asiatic and African shores of the Mediterranean; and to these places will now be added Japan and some of the islands in the Indian ocean.

The present bill is designed to remedy this; and if, instead of saying that all consuls are salaried under it, I should say that it simply provides that a consul shall hold only such an amount of what he collects as is proper for his support, and that all above this shall go to pay those consuls whose receipts are less than a support, I would more clearly describe its provisions.

One year the fees of a consulate may be highly remunerative, and another year scarcely sufficient for the rent of an office. As the consul's fees are contingent upon commerce, in a season of political disturbance, or financial distress, or of war, his support ceases, just when his presence becomes most necessary for the protection of the persons and property of his countrymen. Should the English channel, for example—as was the case, to a certain extent, lately, in the Baltic—become impassable for American commerce, every consul on its borders would be left without support. Thus, under the present system, there can be no regularity in consular returns. It is a lottery, in which some prove prizes, others blanks. While all the consulates, if taken together, would yield sufficient support for all, under actual circumstances, the surplus, at any one port, goes into the pocket of the consul, and the deficiency at another falls upon the Treasury.

The commerce of the country is thus unnecessarily taxed at one point, and fraud upon the revenue perpetrated at another, from the want of adequate support for a consul.

The consul dependent upon the fees of his office for support, is often compelled to stand in the light of a harsh exactor to those whose distress it is his duty to relieve. The knowledge that what is paid for any consular act goes into his pocket, throws a suspicion over all his offers of service. It is made his interest to retain all embarrassments in trade and port regulations that require appeals to him; and as his fees are in proportion to the formalities required in the writing and signing of papers, even those of strict necessity are attributed to this influence.

More than half the expense and annoyance of Americans abroad, in the obtaining and viseing of passports, is considered to result from the required formalities, yielding a fee to American consuls. By a combination between the consuls and the police, vises are often exacted when not required by law; and at other points where their requirement would be dispensed with on the consul's remonstrance, such remonstrance has been withheld because its exaction yields a fee of two dollars for each passport signed. Sometimes, too, the protection this gives has been extended, for a consideration, to those not entitled to it, and, in some instances, American citizens have been manufactured at so much a head.

The bill before the House is framed to remedy these and similar evils. While it is founded upon a conviction of the evils of merchant consuls and a system of fees, it does not, however, entirely abolish either. It goes only to the extent that the English system has gone. Consuls appointed where there is comparatively little trade, and where consular duties occupy but a portion of their time, and where there is no complaint against it, either from the foreign Government or our own citizens, are allowed to trade; and fees, though equalized and reduced in amount, are to be collected for the Government.

This is necessary, because it would be impossible to pass any bill imposing the entire support of our consular system upon the Treasury.

The present bill contains the germs of a system that can be perfected in the future.

Whenever all fees under Government offices of every kind shall be abolished, as I think they should be, they can be easily abolished under this bill, and without affecting in any way the value of its other provisions.

Until that time arrives, however, there are guards under this bill which will effectually prevent the present diversion from the Treasury into private hands of the immense sums now levied in the way of fees upon the commerce of the country.

Where Government offices are remunerated by fees there is a constant disposition to convert them into the means of private profit, rather than of the public good. There are generally three guards upon the abuse.

First. Precision in the amount of the fee, and definiteness in the subject and the service for which it is to be exacted.

Second. The intelligence of the party paying as to what is really due, and his capacity to resist imposition when attempted

Third. The absence of a personal interest in the amount paid by the one who collects it, restraint of public opinion upon his conduct, and liability to punishment for extortion.

The present system of levying fees by American consuls abroad is without any one of these guards. The fees are indefinite in character and amount; they are generally proportioned to the formalities required by the consul himself, and to the charges established in the port where he is located.

He is made a judge of the occasion, when his services are required, and then directly interested in increasing the formalities of trade, and the port regulations of his locality, and in having the authorities levy as many and as high fees upon the commerce of his country as possible.

The persons upon whom he now levies his fees are, from character and pursuit, the most helpless class of American citizens. The sailor, proverbially thoughtless and ignorant, now pays the most numerous and heaviest fees of the consul.

Some of these fees are in the nature of commissions upon the sailor's wages, involving calculations impossible for him to make, and others of them, both in subject and amount, purely at the discretion of the consul.

The consul at a remote locality is placed almost beyond the reach of public opinion, and if disposed to be corrupt, finds almost any abuse justified by the practice of the foreign Government.

The difficulty of bringing home to him the evidence of his extortion in any particular case—the impossibility of perpetuating testimony without his aid, and the time that must necessarily elapse before his conduct can be inquired into, through the State Department, places him almost beyond the fear of punishment.

And, as if to insure extortion, the law provides that all he collects shall go into his own pocket, thus creating a direct positive interest in making his office an agency purely of private gain. The position has been generally sought, and not unfrequently conferred, expressly for this object, and as, in proportion to its yield is the danger of removal, the consul's desire to accumulate is stimulated by the uncertainty of his tenure of office.

I could enumerate instances of the manner in which the interest of commerce, the rights of seamen, and the honor of the country, have suffered under the outrageous abuses of our existing consular service, which, if not certified to beyond question, would seem almost incredible.

The subject, however, is exhaustless, and my time limited. I will, therefore, only mention, briefly, one or two of these evils, as they affect commerce, seamen, and the Government.

At present every vessel touching at a foreign port where there is an American consul, pays to him at least four dollars. The vessel of one hundred tons pays as much as one of three thousand. This operates as a discriminating tax against commerce with countries contiguous, and in favor of wealthy capitalists engaged in distant trade. For example: a vessel of two hundred tons, making twenty voyages in the year, between Boston, or any of the New England ports, and the British Provinces; or between New York, or any of our southern ports, and Cuba and Mexico, would pay eighty dollars—while a vessel with a valuable cargo, and of two thousand tons, sailing to some distant port in China, or the East Indies, would pay only four dollars. Under the bill this charge is proportioned to the tonnage.

For notarial service consuls are now allowed to charge the rates of the country in which they reside, and are, consequently, interested in keeping these rates as high as possible. At some points, where facilities for business are great, the tax for extension of protest, for example, is slight; at others, measured by the rates of a semi-civilized country, where writing is a science, and materials for it scarce, it is enormous. As the actual labor is not dependent upon locality, nor necessarily discharged by the consul, there is no good reason for this difference in the charge.

For example, for extension of protest at Liverpool, the charge has been about nine dollars; at Glasgow, eleven dollars; at Calcutta, thirty-two dollars; at Melbourne, thirty-five dollars; at Gibraltar, sixteen dollars; and at Halifax, Nova Scotia, twenty dollars; at St. Helena and Bermuda, eight dollars.

In Spain, at Cadiz and Malaga, eight dollars; and at Havana, seventeen dollars; and at Matanzas, in the same island, twenty-five dollars.

So in France, at Bordeaux, twelve dollars; and at Havre and Marseilles, eight dollars.

So at Panama, twenty to thirty dollars; and at Carthagena, in the same country, eight dollars.

Under the bill, the amount paid will not go to the consul, and he will have no interest in charging more than a reasonable sum.

Administration upon the estate of citizens of our country dying abroad is a duty often imposed upon consuls. As his employment in this way is not, however, strictly required by law, but generally at the option of the parties interested in the estate of the deceased, the bill imposes a charge equal to that paid at home for similar service, in order to prevent his being burdened unnecessarily with business of this character.

The provisions of the bill regulating the rights of masters of vessels and seamen are such as have been found valuable in experience, and are intended to protect the sailor from many impositions of which he is now the subject.

The fees levied by consuls upon the shipment or discharge of seamen in a foreign port is, under the bill, to be paid by the captain of the vessel. Whenever the captain of an American vessel discharges an American seaman at a foreign port, he is now obliged to pay three months' extra wages. Two months of this goes to the sailor, to aid him in getting home, and one month is paid over to the consul, to serve as a Government fund for destitute seamen. Upon the wages thus paid to seamen, consuls have been in the habit of charging from two and a half to five per cent. As sailors are generally bad calculators, great imposition has been practiced upon them in overcharging this percentage. By the bill this commission, and numerous other fees paid by the sailors, are abolished.

Under the bill, consuls at important points are not permitted to be interested with those who board or furnish supplies for destitute seamen. This guard is required from the fact of many United States consuls in the Pacific keeping hospitals for, and lodging, seamen, and, under our present system, paying themselves for their support, as if sick or destitute, out of the fund made up from the two months' wages paid for discharge of seamen, and, where that is not sufficient, drawing upon the United States Treasury, and receiving a commission of five per cent. upon their bills, as if for moneys advanced.

The operation has been this: The consul is required by law to take care of destitute American seamen thrown upon his hands. He pays their physician and board bills, and provides them passage home. On all moneys thus expended he is allowed five per cent. If he advanced the amount from his private means the percentage would be just. In point of fact, however, he does not advance a dollar; but simply draws a draft upon the Government, which he may sell at a premium. The percentage thus serves only as an inducement to excessive drafts upon the Treasury, the effect of which is seen in the annual appropriation for the relief of seamen, mounting up from originally $10,000, to $125,000 the past year.

Lieutenant Lee, of the brig Dolphin, in a recent report to the Secretary of the Navy, speaking of the system of the relief to sailors, and the abuses practised under it by American consuls, says:

"There is probably no branch of our expenditures which is more impolitic and unnecessary. It is an encouragement to that class of consular agents who are actively engaged, or individually interested in commercial houses, to wink at the oppression practised by some merchant captains upon their crews, and the abuse of bringing out sick relations or friends for the benefit of a sea voyage, to be cared for and returned at the expense of the Government, and is an inducement to that other and numerous host of foreigners acting as agents to consuls to construct cases and expenses which never occurred."

By the bill these abuses are guarded against in the denial to consuls of an interest in the furnishing of supplies to sailors; in abolishing the percentage upon the sums advanced by Government for their relief, and in allowing the office of consul to be filled only by American citizens.

The three principal sources of fees, under the present system, will continue under the bill, changed merely in the mode of collection; and will be—

1. A tax of one half per cent. on tonnage of vessels;

2. The fee paid by captains for shipment and discharge of seamen abroad; and

3. The fee for swearing of invoices before the consul.

Under the bill, what will be the guards upon the just collection and return of these fees?

First. The four dollars fee for receipt and delivery of ship's papers, is changed to one half per cent. on the tonnage of the vessel. The Secretary of the Treasury's report of the commerce and navigation of the country, at different foreign ports, will afford a complete verification of the amount collected in this way. In five minutes at his desk, the Secretary of the Treasury can calculate the fees collected from this source by any consul abroad.

Second. Every captain of a vessel about to sail on a foreign voyage now gives bond to bring back his seamen to their own country. On his return to a home port he places on record the consul's certificate of every seaman shipped or discharged abroad. This makes easy the verification of the fees collected from this source.

Third. All invoices sworn to abroad are now examined and entered of record by the collector at the home port. He has only to multiply the number entered from any foreign port by two dollars, the fee for swearing to them, and he has the amount collected at any consulate abroad.

Will the returns under the bill be sufficient to meet the expense of the consular system?

Under our existing system there are immense corruptions and frauds upon the revenue, and an actual outlay from the Treasury of about $30,000 for consuls at ports where the fees from commerce furnish no support.

Under the present bill the consular system will support itself, save this outlay of $30,000, and, in addition, $40,000, at least, of the fund now wasted under pretense of protection to destitute seamen.

This calculation is based upon the following elements:

First. The amount to be collected from the tax on tonnage of vessels under the bill will be, on calculation, in the aggregate a little less than that now realized from the tax of four dollars for receipt and delivery of ship's papers.

Second. That on shipment and discharge of seamen abroad will be paid by the captains of vessels, and will nearly double what is now received from the same source.

Third. The number of invoices sworn abroad, and the fees arising from them, will be greatly increased, for there will be no reason why the foreign merchant should desire to avoid showing the consul his business, and he will swear his invoices before him.

Take, however, the returns under the present system, as the same in amount as those likely to be collected under the bill, and upon this base a calculation.

There were in 1853, two hundred and ten consulates and commercial agencies under the Government.* Of these only one hundred and thirty-one returned any account of fees. These returns amounted, in that year, to $153,196 19. As the fees collected are now the property of the consul, and there is no law, but only instructions from the State Department, requiring a statement of their amount, but little reliance can be placed on the correctness of the returns. I have not met any one in the service who considered them correct. At some consulates I have evidence that the actual yield has been three, and, in some cases, five times that returned. A fair estimate would probably

*Number of consulates March 3, 1853	193
Commercial agencies March 3, 1853	16
Consul general March 3, 1853	1
Total	210
Whole number by the proposed bill	171
Reduction	39

be to double the aggregate amounts. But, to be entirely safe, I increase them only three fourths, making the yield from fees under the bill $268,085 83¼.

The expense under the bill will be $271,450.

From this take fees collected, and it leaves the cost to the Treasury, $3,364 16.

Under the present system there is paid out of the Treasury annually, for salary to consuls, $27,800.

Showing a saving to the Treasury, in this particular, under the proposed bill, of at least $24,435 84.

If to this be added—one-half would be right, but say one fourth—$40,000 of the $160,000 expended for destitute seamen, and we have by the bill an annual saving of $64,435 84.

Mr. Speaker, I have now gone through the explanation of this bill. I have desired to be brief, and with this view have confined myself to a mere statement of its provisions.

In submitting this diplomatic and consular reform to the action of the House, the committee have discharged a laborious duty. They entered upon it with reluctance, for they knew it to be of a character members would have little leisure to examine, and that the provisions of any bill they proposed could be easily misrepresented.

In behalf of the Committee on Foreign Affairs I now earnestly ask the House to adopt it.

It is utterly useless, under our existing system, to request of that committee an opinion upon the legality of any claim that is preferred against the Government by one in the foreign service. There is no law to guide its decisions, and almost every claim depends upon precedent or the discretion of the Secretary of State. These claims are multiplying with each year, and they will continue to multiply to a fearful extent unless there is some positive law defining the duties to be discharged, and fixing their proper remuneration. Last session about thirty thousand dollars were expended in meeting these demands. They come into the House without explanation, get attached to our general appropriation bills, no one knows how, and pass, no one knows why, running up our aggregate expenditures, each one becoming a precedent, prolific of similar demands in the future. This should not be. It is a great abuse. It reflects discredit upon those in the foreign service, subjects themr to pesonal humiliation, and is entirely opposed to the genius of our institutions.

Mr. Speaker, in all that I have said I have avoided reference either to party or to individuals.

This is a national reform, equally affecting every portion of the country, and, until it is accomplished, good men of all parties, engaged in the foreign service, will participate alike in the popular prejudice that now exists, created by the abuses of a defective system.

I have also avoided any reference to the foreign policy of our Government, either in the past or present. Its discussion has nothing to do with the reforms of this bill.

Although embarrassed by jealousies in our early relations with foreign Powers, we have found, in our remoteness from the conflicts of Europe, and our geographical position at the head of a great continent, advantages which, with the cautious maxims of Washington, are destined, beyond doubt, to make us the commercial and political center of the world.

In sixty-five years we have grown from a few comparatively feeble settlements into a great empire. Civilization has, within this period, poured its light into our great central valley, and forests have disappeared, cities sprung up, and a magnificent landscape everywhere spread itself out, beautiful in the results of religion, and law:

Population	5,305,925	23,191,876
Area of territory	820,680	2,936,166
Exports	$70,971,780	$151,898,720
Imports	$91,252,768	$178,138,318
Tonnage	972,492	3,535,454
Seamen	60,000	140,000
Commercial treaties with	5 nations.	19 nations.
Revenues of Government	$10,694,997	$43,375,898
Expenses of Government	$7,411,370	$43,002,168
Expenses of foreign service	$153,000	$412,7c9

In this it may be questioned whether the internal or foreign policy of the Government has had the most influence.

The extension of our territory; the rapid development of our wealth; the opening of new, and the increase of old, sources of foreign trade; and the participation in it of the capital and products of all sections of the Union, have caused to sympathize nearly every domestic interest with foreign affairs. It is no exaggeration to say that there is not an acre of corn or cotton grown in the West or South, not an American vessel in any port in the world insured, not a loan made, nor a note discounted at any of our banks, which is not affected in its value, or in some way acted upon, and made a vibration of the great political and financial movements of the rest of the world. The fact that these domestic interests which thus, like nerves, spread all over the globe, connect remote localities with interior points of our own country, cannot be protected by our own legislation, but depend upon treaties and the regard of the other Powers of the earth for certain great principles of international law, makes the perfecting of the agency through which we communicate with the rest of the world a matter of great practical importance.

A distinguished statesman of England, speaking on this subject, has called ministers and consuls "the ears, eyes, and mouths of a Government, by which it hears, sees, and communicates with the rest of the world." The object of this bill is to make these organs of communication respond more distinctly to the purpose of their creation.

It is time that something was done to reform existing abuses. Our interests at home and abroad demand it. The honor of the country requires it. The occasion is a fit one.

The bill introduced by the committee has been framed from a careful examination of the bills and reports of the committees of this House, aided by the personal and official experience of many who have been connected with our foreign service. It does not profess to be perfect. It is difficult to frame such a bill.

It embraces, however, features which have been unanimously recommended by previous reports, and it has sought to embody them in such a shape as to correct abuses, facilitate the public business, and serve as the basis of any further reform that may be found necessary.

THE COLT PATENT.

SPEECH OF HON. C. T. JAMES,

OF RHODE ISLAND,

IN THE SENATE, March 3, 1855.

On the bill to authorize the Commissioner of Patents to extend the Patent heretofore granted to Samuel Colt for an improvement in Fire-Arms:

Mr. JAMES said:

Mr. PRESIDENT: Before this bill is finally disposed of, I hope the Senate will indulge me with the opportunity to make some remarks, which justice to Colonel Colt, to the law of patents, and to the public, would seem equally to demand, as well as to the committee who reported the bill. In doing this, I shall find it necessary to say something of the mutual or relative rights of the patentee and the public, the benefits derived to the public from inventions, and the particular merits of Colonel Colt's claims, as set forth in the bill and in the report of your Committee on Patents and the Patent Office. In the first place, permit me to allude to the value and importance of practical inventive genius to the public, as well as to individual interests and welfare.

I am fully aware, sir, that the mechanic arts are considered, and justly, too, as being secondary to agriculture. Yet, sir, what would be the state of agriculture in our country at this moment, but for the aid of that secondary science, mechanics, aided, fostered, and brought into practical use by the application of inventive genius? Why is not the American farmer, in the middle of this nineteenth century, preparing his fields to receive the seed—the germ of his future harvest—with an apology for a plow in the form of a painted stick of wood—the primitive implement of the untaught barbarian, and still in use, with very trifling improvement, among many tribes and nations of the earth? Because, sir, the eye of skill and science long since discovered that, with such rude implements, requiring a vast amount of labor, the tiller of the ground was able to realize but a tithe of the fruits the earth was capable of yielding. Mechanical genius stepped in to obviate the evil. And what has been the result? Let the numerous improvements and inventions relating not only to the plow, but to every other agricultural implement, be brought into the account. Take note of the saving of two thirds of the labor, with the increase of two hundred per cent. in the amount of product, and we may form some idea of what inventive genius has done for agriculture.

Why is not the cotton planter of the South at this moment employing twenty hands to pick the seeds from cotton for two weeks, which two hands, with a horse or mule, can do in as many hours? Because there arose a Whitney, whose practical eye saw the waste of labor, and whose ready and practical inventive genius soon discovered the means to counteract the evil.

Little more than a quarter of a century has elapsed since our farmers used the sickle as a harvester, and trod out the grain with horses, or beat it out with flails. These means have been set aside and superseded by the reaper, the threshing machine, &c.; and the amount of labor and expense thus saved on the immense quantities of the cereals produced in our country exceed all attempts at calculation. And to whom and what is agriculture indebted for these very numerous and important benefits? Not to itself, surely; for she is simply practical in her own field of labor. No. She is indebted for them entirely to inventive genius and the mechanic arts.

Mr. President, even the learned sciences are under obligations, great and unmistakable, to inventive genius and mechanical skill. In thousands of instances, though men well versed in the speculative sciences may fully understand the results they wish to produce, and the laws that must govern the process, are yet dependent on the inventor and the mechanic for the means. Scientific men had long pondered on the power of steam, and had even made some impotent attempts to press it into the service of man; but they all failed. It required men with the mechanical and inventive genius of Bolton, Watt, Evans, and Sickels to carry out the sublime project, and to accomplish wonders of which the scientific world had never dreamed. The result to the civilized world has been far more wonderful than the invention itself. It has multiplied almost to infinity the luxuries, the elegances, and the comforts of life. By almost annihilating time and space, it has facilitated a hundred-fold, intercourse between towns, cities, States, and nations; thus diffusing knowledge, strengthening the bands of amity and friendship, and greatly multiplying the products of human skill. In short, the benefits of this noble invention, and which are daily on the increase, are beyond the utmost stretch of human calculation.

As respects manufactured articles of every description, invention and improvement are in continued progress, and scarce an article can be named that has not within half a century been improved from fifty to a hundred per cent. in quality and form, and mostly by machinery invented for the purpose, while they have all been reduced in cost in about the same ratio. Look, sir, at the Hindoo, as he sits under the thick foliage of some spreading tree top, and witness the slow and tedious process by which he draws out and twists the thread of cotton with his fingers. Look at another, who, with his web of yarn suspended from another tree, slowly, with his hands, inserts the woof, and converts the whole into cloth. Sir, scarce a century has passed away, since this, still practiced in Hindostan, was the only mode known in the world of the manufacture of cotton. Look now into the manufactory of modern days, as improved by mechanical skill and invention; and there you see manufactured, by means of the spindle and the loom, and their accompanying auxiliary machinery, apparently almost without the aid of human labor, a greater quantity of the fabric manufactured for each person employed in a given time, than could probably be made by five hundred Hindoo spinners and weavers with their primitive implements.

Once more on this subject. Turn back in our recollections, those who can, to the period some forty-five years since. Cotton goods then selling at thirty cents per yard can now be purchased at seven and a half cents; and yet the prices of labor, and the cost of living, have much increased since that period. And what causes have produced this reduction? Improvements in the cultivation of cotton, the introduction of the cotton gin, and the almost innumerable inventions and improvements made in the manufacturing machinery. Is it not wonderful? And shall we not highly appreciate the genius, the energies, the intellect, and the labors, by the combination and exercise of which such great results have been achieved? It need not be shown that all the causes named go to increase the means to subserve human wants, while they multiply, improve, and cheapen products. At the same time, it is equally plain that, by reducing the quantity of labor necessary to any given result, they leave a surplus to be applied to other objects which could not be attained without it, and thus facilitate and enhance the general wealth.

The second point is, to inquire whether men who spend time, money, labor, and energy, as well as intellectual power, in bringing about these improvements which so much benefit mankind, have or have not the exclusive right to their inventions, and should or should not be protected in the enjoyment of that right?

It would seem to be supposed by many, I apprehend by most people, that a patent creates a right, which is conferred as a special favor on the inventor. From this view of the subject I must take the liberty to differ in toto. It is as plain as the light of the sun at noonday that the product, be it what it may, of a man's own industry, ingenuity, capital, and intellect, and by honest means, is as truly his own property, by virtue of natural right, as the same can be made so by legal enactment. The crop raised by the agriculturist on his own field even the savage recognizes as his own property. But the owner of this crop, dwelling in the midst of people without laws, may have it wrested from him by the hand of violence before he has had an opportunity to deposit it in a place of safety. What does man require? The strong arm of law to protect him in the possession and enjoyment of property already his own—not to give him the right of property, for that he already has. Thus with regard to all property, the laws create no right of possession; they only define the right, and sustain and protect it.

The original work of an author and the invention and discovery of a man of mechanical or scientific genius are just as truly and exclusively their property, on every principle of right and justice, as would be the products of their own fields, by the labor of their own hands, and should be just as thoroughly secured to them by the laws of the land. The laws fully recognize this principle, and are designed, as far as relates to this subject, to carry that principle out for a time, and for specific purposes.

Patent laws are a species of compromise between the public and the inventor. The invention belongs to him, his heirs, executors, and assigns, forever. He has the unquestionable right, as with any other species of his own property, either to dispose of it to the public or to individuals, or to suppress it, destroy it, or operate with it in secret, as he may deem proper; and no one can interfere with him as to the manner in which he may determine to dispose of it. It is deemed, however, that the invention would be valuable to the public; but it is also deemed unjust that its owner should be required to give it to the public, for their benefit, without securing to him the opportunity to realize from it a sum equivalent to the time and money expended in making his invention and bringing it into use, and a reward, by way of remunerating him as a public benefactor, in some degree proportionate to the benefits conferred. Such is the mutual contract, by law, between the public and the inventor.

Because the right of property in the invention would at once be invaded when introduced to the public unless invasions were prevented by means of legal restraint, the law volunteers to secure to the inventor and owner his right of property for a certain period, and holding out in prospective, also, on the principle of equity, that, if the period specified be not adequate to produce the remuneration and reward anticipated in the law, the period may be extended till the object shall have been secured.

These remarks are founded on the eternal principles of right and justice. The public has no stronger or more rightful claim to an invention, other than by gift or purchase, than to the lands, goods, and chattels of the inventor; and he who would force it from him, or willfully invade his rights as an inventor, would perform acts morally no better than it would be to rob or swindle him of any other property. On these grounds it is that the inventor agrees to relinquish his invention to the public at a future day; and the consideration is the promise of legal protection in the enjoyment of his rights till that day shall have passed.

If my suggestions thus far be correct, and it appears to me they are, the only benefit derived by the inventor by legislation, is protection of the original right of property, his entirely, independent of legal enactments, for a limited period, while all other property is secured to its owners by unlimited protection, and forever. And, sir, I repeat the declaration: He who knowingly and willfully invades the rights of a patentee, thus legally recognized and admitted, performs an act in no manner more honorable than it would be to take, clandestinely, the money from his purse at midnight, and no less legally wrong.

There exists, with many persons, a feeling of hostility against all patents, and more especially against all extensions of them, on the assumed ground that they are monopolies, and conflicting with the rights of the public. It is difficult to account for the existence of such a feeling, unless we look for its origin either to ignorance, selfishness, or both. A monopoly, in the popular and odious sense of the term, is a right or privilege common to the whole community, wrested from them, and bestowed exclusively on one person, or association of persons. Thus, were a patent to be issued to one man, conferring on him the sole and exclusive privilege to cultivate wheat, and, by means of a stringent law, with heavy penalties, should all others be prevented from cultivating the same, this would be an odious monopoly in the true sense of the term; because it would deprive the public of the enjoyment of a right common to all, and concentrate that right, by an arbitrary decree, in the person of one individual.

On the other hand, should that person have discovered a new and useful method, unknown to every one else, by means of which he could increase the crop a hundred per centum to the acre, and improve its quality, that method would be his own; no other person could urge even the slightest possible claim to it. And no law founded on right and justice, or in accordance with our republican institutions, could or would compel him to impart a knowledge of that method to others. That invention is the inventor's own property, as truly so as the ground he has purchased with his own money. Should the individual farmer wish to obtain a knowledge of the invention, he must pay for it; and, if a liberal, enlightened, and honest man, he will willingly pay for the invention, and the right to use it, in proportion to what it has cost the inventor, and to the benefits he (the farmer) may derive from it. As property, the law cannot compel the invention to be given up without payment, even for public use, because the Constitution provides that private property shall not be taken for public uses without just compensation.

The security of the right of this inventor by patent is evidently no more truly a monopoly, for the time being, than the possession and control of the fields on which he employs his new method of cultivation. Both are his, unquestionably so. But there is this difference in the result: For the consideraton of a trifling annual tax the law warrants and secures to him the quiet and peaceable possession of his fields, and to his heirs, and assigns forever. But the right in his patent invention is secured to him only for a limited period; and then, unlike his lands, although equally and solely his own property, the right and possession are relinquished for the use and benefit of the public.

Blanchard, and those to whom he may dispose of it, and they only, have the right to use his patent inventions for turning gun-stocks, shoe lasts, and other irregular forms. Yet every one has the right to manufacture such articles by all other means. His patent, therefore, is no monopoly, because it deprives the public of no rights the public ever possessed, and secures to Blanchard only those originally his own. How the public is wronged, then, it is difficult to learn. By means of the patent machine, as the case is with all useful inventions, a better and cheaper article is obtained than could otherwise be had. There is no prohibition of the manufacture of the article by any other means. The public certainly should be willing, then, that the patentee* should share, in some small degree, in the benefits they receive to compensate and reward him; and others who realize the advantages of the patented machinery over all other modes of operation should, as matter of justice as well as law, be willing to pay a reasonable sum for the right to use it. On such conditions any one and all may have it. And what becomes of the odious monopoly? It results in a creature of the imagination. Patent laws only secure to patentees the right common to all men: to do as they will with their own.

Mr. President, in what I have said, I do not flatter myself with having exhibited much of the lawyer. But, sir, it appears to me to be fully in fellowship with the dictates of reason, justice, equity, human right, and common sense; and the true intent and meaning of the patent laws, as far as I am qualified or able to understand them. From these premises it is my wish now to examine, briefly, the claims of Colonel Colt for an extension of his patent, which has, without any sound reason, in my apprehension, been rejected in the other House. This it is my wish to do, in justice to your committee which reported in favor of the claim, and, incidentally, in justice to Colonel Colt.

The first inquiry which presents itself is, is Samuel Colt, the petitioner, the true inventor of the arm that bears his name? In other words, is the invention of Colt's revolving arms rightfully the property of Samuel Colt, the petitioner? For it has been shown, in my apprehension, beyond all doubt or cavil, that the invention of him who makes it and brings it into use, is his property by right, independent of legal sanction; and as such, should, in justice and equity, be secured to him by legal, and, if necessary, judicial action.

In answer to these queries, it will be necessary only to say the question has passed the ordeals of two of the severest judicial tests ever applied to any patent in the United States. The first trial was had in Boston, Massachusetts, in June, 1851, before his honor, the late and lamented Levi Woodbury, one of the Associate Justices of the Supreme Court of the United States. The defendants in the case were the "Massachusetts Arms Company," who were prosecuted by Samuel Colt, plaintiff, for invasions of his patent rights. This trial occupied the court for a long period, and the investigation was thorough and complete. Able counsel was employed on both sides. More than twenty witnesses were examined and cross-examined, at great length; many of them experts. The details of the trial cover more than three hundred closely printed octavo pages, including the charge of the court. The jury, with that charge, and the testimony that had been given pro and con., required but a brief space for deliberation, and soon returned into court with this verdict:

"The jury, in the case of Colt vs. the Massachusetts Arms Company, find in the plaintiff's gun, a new and novel combination to produce the effect described in his patent, not found in any other fire-arm prior to his invention; and the jury further find the defendants have infringed the first three claims of the plaintiff's patent, and assess damages in the sum of one dollar, according to the agreement."*

The second and last trial took place in the southern district of New York, before his Honor Judge Nelson, one of the Associate Justices of the Supreme Court of the United States, on application of Samuel Colt for an injunction against Hiram Young and Francis Leavitt, as invaders of Colt's patent rights. And in this case, too, after a hard-fought struggle, Colt's priority of invention was firmly established, and the court issued the injunction asked for.

Sir, after these trials, attended with such searching investigations, with the aid of able counsel, and under the direction of such courts, and the decisive results arrived at, it would be but a waste of time to offer any further proofs that Samuel Colt is the original inventor of the arm that bears his name, and that, consequently, the invention is his own property. Such being the facts, the next question that arises, is, has he the equitable right to claim, and is he entitled to a reasonable compensation for that right, or that property, as the consideration for its abandonment to the public? Having the provisions of law applicable to the case, common sense and common justice both reply in the affirmative, provided the invention be useful. That it is useful and valuable is abundantly evident, as well from the numerous testimonials of those qualified to judge as from the numerous infringements that have occurred, and the determined and persevering hostility of interested parties to the extension of the patent. It will be remembered that, while the patent was considered to be without value, no such hostility was manifested, and no infringements attempted.

The invention of Samuel Colt, then, is his property, and has value. No man has the just right to demand the surrender of this property at his hands without a consideration equivalent to its value; nor has the law the constitutional authority to wrest it from him without awarding to him a just compensation. The patent laws of this country, though they limit the period through which a patent shall extend, recognize the same general principle, by intimating, in one of its provisions, that the patentee is entitled, before the surrender of his invention to the public, to receive a full compensation for his labors and expenditures in making and perfecting his invention, and a reward besides in proportion to the benefits conferred on the public. Should he fail to realize such an amount during the period that the patent laws, or the commissioner under them, assign him, he has an appeal to Congress, who, in my estimation, are bound to aid him, by the extension of his patent, till the object contemplated in the law shall have been accomplished. To refuse, is to do an act of injustice; because the refusal is the indirect means of depriving the patentee of what is actually his due, and of that which the law virtually awards him. And to grant protection for the accomplishment of that object is not a special favor, but the fulfillment of an implied compromise—a virtual contract between the Government, on behalf of the public, and the patentee for the relinquishment of his right.

The next point to which I would call attention is, as to the reward and compensation received by Colonel Colt, and the inquiry, have they been such as to compensate him for his expenses of time and money, and in proportion to the value of his invention to the public?

It may be questioned if improvements in fire-arms are as generally useful to the public, and equally valuable as improvements in implements of agriculture, mechanics, manufactures, &c. Certainly, as relates to the general purposes of life, they are not. But to those to whom such weapons become necessary they certainly are. To the traveler, and to others, placed in situations and under circumstances warranting the probability, and perhaps certainty, of attacks from marauders, freebooters, or deadly assassins, arms for defense become absolutely necessary to the preservation of life. Until the arrival of a millennium, should such a happy period ever arrive, the Government, notwithstanding all the well-meant efforts of peace congresses and peace societies, will find it necessary to keep up an organized military force; even now, to prevent our frontiers from being ravaged and our citizens from being butchered by savage hordes. And, in the future, no one may presume to say how soon or how late our country may find the necessity forced upon her to defend herself against a foreign foe. To individuals, then, and especially to our Government, improvements in fire-arms, to make them more useful and effective, must certainly be of great value and importance. An arm capable of making six discharges in twice that number of seconds, with greater precision, and greater safety than any other weapon, cannot be otherwise than invaluable to him who is placed under the necessity of defending himself against the attack of the highwaymen, or protecting himself, his wife and children, and his home and property from the inroads of the midnight burglar and assassin.

The superiority, the utility, and the consequent value of such an arm to military men against the savages on our frontier, and also on the field of battle with a disciplined foe, cannot be too highly estimated. The superiority which such an arm imparts to a given force over an equal force in point of numbers armed with the common weapon, is too obvious to demand proof; and yet I shall give it. I would first remark, however, that the benefits resulting from the use of the improved arm, are both to the Government and the soldier. To the latter it gives an unmistakable advantage over his opponent, both in attack and defense. To the Government it becomes the means of power, and the saving of life and money, because, one hundred men, furnished with the improved arm, are equal to three hundred, at least, furnished with that in ordinary use. Of course there must be a great saving of life and money. To show that I am well sustained in my views, I may be permitted to quote from the testimony of gentlemen whose qualifications to enable them to judge correctly no one will call in question, and all will readily admit.

In the first place, permit me to quote the opinion, and give the names of a long array of our gallant military officers, and among them many of high standing. They say:

"We, the undersigned, have examined Colt's repeating fire-arms, and some of us have witnessed sundry experiments which have been made to prove their safety, simplicity, durability, accuracy, and celerity of fire, force of penetration, and security against moisture; and we are convinced that they possess many important advantages, both for public and private service. As an act of justice to the ingenious inventor, we most cordially recommend them to the patronage of the Government and the public.

One would be led to suppose, if unacquainted with depraved human nature, that this array of testimony itself, aided by the legal decisions already quoted, would have settled the question of merit forever, and insured to Colonel Colt the reward due him for his invention. But other elements than those that should actuate the human mind have been busily at work for years to ruin his fortunes and trample on his rights.

There is a large number of certificates, all of which have on a former occasion been before the Senate, all from competent and honorable witnesses, and all certifying the superiority of Colt's repeating arms over every other pistol for army service, and for guerrilla and Indian warfare. Of these I shall quote but a few, and those mostly from officers who have made up their judgment from their personal experience. I give the opinion of the Board of Ordnance Practice. The members of that board say:

"From the examination and trials which they have made of these arms, the board are of opinion that Colt's revolving pistol is better adapted to the services of mounted troops than any other pistol offered to their notice, and may be advantageously substituted for the present cavalry pistol.

The certificate I now give is particularly valuable from the experience of the signers in the use of Colt's pistol, and their opinion of its durability, &c.

Communication from the Texan Senators and Representatives in Congress, to the President of the United States.

WASHINGTON CITY, March 3, 1848.

DEAR SIR: Possessing a thorough knowledge of Colt's patent repeating fire-arms, we feel it to be our duty to recommend them in the strongest terms to your favorable consideration.

The advantages that Texas has experienced from their use, in her struggle for independence, and against Indian aggression, has been incalculable.

The difficulties presented by some men without experience in the use of those arms, such as that they are too liable to get out of order, has been proved by ten years' constant use in Texas, to be without foundation. Some of these arms, purchased of Mr. Colt more than ten years ago, have been safely and successfully used in every engagement we have had with the Mexicans and Indians since that time, and are now in good serviceable condition, and are esteemed beyond price by their possessors.

Believing that the power rests with you to order a full supply of these valuable arms for the defense of our extended frontier, without further legislation, we most respectfully ask that you will at once order them to be made.

We do not doubt but that five thousand mounted men, armed with two of these pistols and a rifle, would do more service than twenty thousand armed in the ordinary way, thereby saving to the Government hundreds of thousands of dollars annually, and affording protection as well to the frontiers against Indians as to all parties passing through the Indian country.

With great respect, your obedient servants,
THOMAS J. RUSK, U. S. Senate.
DAVID S. KAUFMAN, House of Reps.
SAM HOUSTON, U. S. Senate.
T. PILSBURY, House of Reps.

To the PRESIDENT of the United States.

Colonel Jack Hayes, commanding the Texas rangers in Mexico, writes:

"I have had a good opportunity of testing the utility of Colt's pistols during the late Mexican war, and I feel no hesitation in saying they are superior (in my opinion) to any other now known for cavalry. The danger of accidental explosion has been obviated by the late improvement. They go off clear. The cylinders revolve with great rapidity; and the distance they carry a ball, (I mean the conical ball,) is, indeed, surprising. Soldiers should be practiced in the use of them. They soon become easy to the hand; the aim which you wish to draw can be easily caught; and when placed in the hands of those who understand the proper use of them, they are unquestionably the most formidable weapon ever used in battle. I therefore concur fully in the opinion that they can be used with the same advantage by the regular as volunteer forces."

No one, it is believed, will doubt the competency of this hero of the West to pronounce a correct judgment on this subject, and Brigadier General Shields, commanding first brigade volunteers in Mexico, reports that:

"Colt's last improved revolving pistol, in my opinion, is a most excellent and effective weapon in the present cavalry service in Mexico. It possesses an advantage of at least three to one over the common pistol. I find it, also, free from that complexity which it was feared would render it less serviceable in actual service and in a campaign. I do not hesitate to give it a decided preference in cavalry service in Mexico, over all other species of fire-arms, and recommend its general use in that service."

Brigadier General F. Pierce, now President of the United States, commanding volunteers in Mexico, reports that he had a pretty thorough knowledge of the weapon, and cheerfully concurs in the opinion of General Shields. And Major J. L. Freaner, General Scott's staff in Mexico, considers them the best arms in use; says that he was informed by Colonel Hays, if his men had not been armed with them, when Padre Jarauta attacked him at Teotolecan, that he would have lost his command of seventy men; and that it was by the aid of this weapon that he was enabled to repulse the guerrilla chief without the loss of a man.

In addition to these testimonials, Brigadier General Joseph Lane, commanding volunteers in Mexico, writes:

"I think I can say as much for and about this formidable weapon as any one now living, except Colonel Jack Hays, of Texas, (poor Walker is no more.) I have seen them tested in several severe and bloody conflicts, when a few men, armed with Colt's revolver, were equal to five, and in several instances to ten times their numbers. No weapon is equal to it. In close quarters, one man is always equal to three or more. I know the use of it well, and would recommend that all mounted forces be armed with them."

Brevet Brigadier General W. S. Harney, Colonel Second Dragoons, United States Army, reports that—

"He has had more than ten years' experience in the use of Colt's repeating fire-arms, and no arm, in his judgment, ever yet constructed, can equal them; they are, with fair usage, as little liable to get out of order as any other arm, and they are, at least, three times as effective. It is my intention to apply to the honorable Secretary of War, to have all the cavalry armed with them."

To these I will add only the testimony of the lamented Brigadier General Worth, who, in a letter to Mr. Colt, writes:

"The recent Mexican war has fully demonstrated the formidable character of this weapon in all mounted corps or partisan service. You can have no better or higher testimony than that of General Lane and Colonel Jack Hays, both gallant officers and of large experience. In a higher degree will its value be shown in our Indian contests, where the onset is sudden, and fierce, and momentary; where it is of first importance to deliver the largest amount of fire in the briefest time."

It would seem that, even were there no law to secure to the inventor the right to enjoy the sole and exclusive use and control of his invention till he shall have been amply compensated and rewarded, a generous, liberal, and honest community, for an invention so valuable to the public as that of Colonel Colt, would voluntarily and gladly confer that privilege on him, and aid him in the accomplishment of his object. But such does not, at least in his case, appear to be true. While contending with what would have been to most men insurmountable obstacles, and struggling with poverty, to complete his invention, others looked on with indifference, perhaps sneered at him as a visionary, and left him to work out, single handed, what they considered his absurd and worthless problem. But the moment they found his long protracted efforts had been crowned with success, and that his invention was a reality, a set of men, with little mechanical genius of their own, and moved by the spirit of avarice, endeavored to rob him of the triumph of his genius, so hardly earned, and to deprive him of the enjoyment of its fruits. Foiled in these nefarious attempts, by the decisions of courts of law, they have followed him, as a pack of hounds fellow at the heels of a wounded deer, from the courts to the Patent Office, and from the Patent Office to Congress, to work his ruin.

Who are the parties that are most loud in their demands that Colonel Colt's patent shall expire with the expiration of its present term, and who make their demand on the pretended ground of public justice? Is it not a well known fact that these cries for justice come from those who have heir individual private interests to gratify, and whose sole object is to speculate on the misfortunes of another? And what arguments do they advance to justify their hostility, and to defeat Colonel Colt in his application to Congress to protect his right? It is that the patentee has realized all, and more than all, that the law contemplates, or justice awards, as a compensation and reward for his invention. And this statement has been sounded and reiterated by the press, in public, on one floor of Congress, and throughout the Union, with the untruth that Colonel Colt has amassed a fortune of $1,000,000, till most people believe it true. And yet, sir, it is destitute of any foundation in truth. But suppose it were true that the property in Colonel Colt's possession, and that his own, were to him, under the circumstances, for the time being, actually worth $1,000,000, his compensation and reward would still fall short of what they should be.

By the way, before proceeding further to examine this point, I will introduce an interesting item of foreign testimony to the merits of Colonel Colt's invention. The British Army Register says:

"As Englishmen, we frankly and fairly admit it: Colonel Colt has the claim of precedence, and the patent of superiority; and we scorn to deny either one or the other."

In addition to this, Colonel Colt received the large medal at the World's Fair in London, as a testimonial of the superiority of his revolving arm over every other; and to crown all, Colonel Colt was chosen a member of the society of civil engineers in England. Such were the convictions of the British Government as to its merits, that they removed all restrictions (as respected this) on the importation of fire-arms, and conferred on Colonel Colt the distinguished privilege of importing his into that country, to an unlimited extent, duty free. Colonel Colt has received testimonials from almost every civilized nation in the world in return for the high appreciation of his inventive genius, as illustrated in his revolver. Yet, by the envious, jealous, and selfish spirit of a class of American citizens, no pains are spared to deprive him of the honor of his invention, to trample on his rights, and to ruin his prospects, after he has conferred such advantages on his country, and so highly honored her abroad. But his opponents say, and many people besides believe it, that he has accumulated a fortune of more than a million of dollars. Suppose we admit this statement to be correct—though, I regret to say, it is far, very far, from the truth—what then?

From the period at which a man commences to make a useful and important invention till the period of its completion and perfection, is a period of experiment and expense. And if, during that time, he finds it necessary to resort to new and expensive means to perfect his invention and to increase its value and utility to the public, even the cost of these means becomes a legitimate and proper item in the list of expenses, which should be repaid to him, especially if the means adopted are useful only for the production of the result in view.

Let us suppose a case. Suppose, then, a person now sets himself at work to make an important invention. In the course of a year, he so far succeeds as to satisfy himself and others of the correctness of the principle and the feasibility of his plan, and produces an implement that effects the result intended. To secure his interest for the time, he applies for and obtains a patent. The machine produced is imperfect and costly, as well as dangerous. After a course of experiments for near twenty years to come, and the loss of $300,000, the machine has been brought so near perfection as to become highly useful. But here other difficulties occur, and a set of harpies who have been watching for their prey, step in, and by base imitations and infringements on the inventor's patent rights, come in competition with him, to ruin him and swindle the public. There is one only way in which he can prevent this, and that is, by the use of machinery for the manufactured article, which would be nearly useless and worthless for any other purpose. This machinery he procures. By means of it he makes his patented article perfect and complete, enhances its value to the public, and, at the same time, reduces its cost by more than sixty per cent. But, on the other hand, by the time he has effected this great object his patent has expired. It cannot be renewed. His funds are all expended. The market is taken possession of by those who will impose a base article on the public. They will not purchase his machinery, because they can bring out the counterfeit without it cheaper than the genuine with it. The inventor loses his all, and is left in poverty. Is this right? Is it just?

I have here stated a case very similar to that of Colonel Colt, merely taking the prospective instead of retrospective view. That gentleman commenced on his invention nearly twenty-five years ago. Though fully satisfied of the correctness of the principle, and of final success, his first essay was imperfect, and the arm produced, when compared with present specimens, imperfect, clumsy in appearance, and sometimes dangerous in use. Nineteen years were years of experiment, to bring the arm to a state of comparative perfection; and during that time, he and his friends sunk, in the manufacture, more than $300,000. All this time and money, as any reasonable man will see, should be put down in the list of expenditures of time and money made in bringing out the invention and perfecting it. These, reckoning his time at a reasonable rate, together with the interest on the money actually expended, would now amount to more than $750 000. Suppose, then, his property worth $1,000,000, subtract this outlay from it, and you would leave him only $250,000. And surely it would not be pretended by any liberal-minded man that that sum would be anything like a reward proportionate to the benefits conferred on the public by this great invention. But, sir, there is yet more to be taken into the account.

Up to a late period, but a few years since, Colonel Colt found that his pistols, in their improved form and condition, could not be manufactured at a cost less than forty-five dollars each. This fact gave rise to two very serious evils. In the first place, the high price put them out of the reach of many to whom they were necessary; and, in the second place, it encouraged unscrupulous men to manufacture and palm upon the public a worthless and dangerous arm, composed of cast iron, at less than one fourth the cost of the cast steel arm manufactured by Colonel Colt. By this means he saw both the public and himself must suffer; and relying on the justice of his cause for protection, either from the Patent Office or from Congress, he followed the suggestions of his fertile genius and enterprising spirit to remedy or counteract these evils. The result has been the invention of very ingenious tools and machinery adapted to the manufacture of his arms, and to nothing else, by which the price has already been reduced from forty-five to fifteen dollars, and which, with improvements now in progress, and those which will hereafter be adopted, would, doubtless, under the operation of Colonel Colt's patent for a proper time, bring the cost down quite as low as that of the miserable cast iron imitation. During all this time, the quality of this arm has been in a state of progressive improvement; and, at this moment, it is the most beautiful, and the most perfect and efficient pistol the world has ever known. But, sir, all this has not been done without the expenditure of much time and money. A full remuneration for all the time and money thus expended in bringing out all these important improvements, Colonel Colt should, according to my notions of simple justice, be furnished with the opportunity to realize, under the operation of an extended patent, for which he has applied. And now how stands the case?

Suppose, as Colonel Colt's opponents aver, his property actually amounts to $1,000,000; we have seen that, after having deducted the actual losses and expenditures, there is left but $250,000. Even his opponents reckon the cost of his tools and machinery at no less than some $300,000, or more; and these, as before noticed, have been made with the view to perfect the arm, and to cheapen it to the public. They are, therefore, as much to the public benefit, as the original invention itself; and for them the public should pay in proportion to the benefits received. Deduct from their cost the amount left to Colonel Colt from the imaginary $1,000,000, namely, $250,000, and you leave his invention still indebted to him in the amount of some hundreds of thousands.

But Colonel Colt has no such amount of property as $1,000,000. That amount is utterly fabulous, and the means by which that amount was made out, was one of that hocus pocus sort of operations, by which a mole hill is magnified into a mountain. If a matter so serious as a statement made under oath were fit subject for merriment, surely that by which this amount was made out, and the evidence by which the statement was attempted to be sustained, might stand in the front rank of laughable subjects. But as it can hardly be supposed that sensible men could believe such a statement, founded on such evidence, the actors in the affair are rather subjects of pity than of ridicule. And how was the statement made? It was made in its broad and naked form; that Colonel Colt was actually worth more than $1.000,000, the profits of his business, the manufacture of his repeating arm. And how was this statement sustained? Let me explain. Thus the case stands: A cast iron pistol is brought forward, made in imitation of Colt's cast steel revolver, and taken as the standard of cost for each. Then, the number of revolvers manufactured by Colonel Colt is calculated. The excess of the market price of the latter over the cost of the other is determined, and the aggregate of that excess in the number of Colt's revolvers that had been made, was set down as the amount of his profits. Thus, if the cost of the cast iron counterfeit was five dollars, and the price of the genuine article fifteen dollars, then suppose one hundred thousand of the latter to have been made and sold, the profit on one would be ten dollars, and on the whole, in the aggregate, $1,000,000. And this was the actual process by which the clear profits of the patentee were made to amount to that sum. This was a wonderful piece of legerdemain.

To a person at all acquainted with working the two metals it is hardly necessary to say a word to point out the fallacy of such a mode of calculation. In one case, the barrel, cylinder, &c., are wrought out of solid bars of cast steel; in the other case, the parts are of cast iron. Between casting these in moulds, and giving them a polish in a lathe, and boring, planing, turning, and polishing the solid cast steel, it need not be said, there is a very great difference, to say nothing of the immense difference in the cost of materials. But, to come directly to the point, when the cast iron arm was sold at some six or seven dollars each, in 1846, Colt's cast steel revolvers could not be afforded even at twenty-eight dollars, by the aid of all the improvements in the tools and machinery for their manufacture up to that time. To this fact we have the statement of Colonel Colt, under oath, made in May, 1854, to the Senate Committee on Patents and the Patent Office. Colonel Colt, the deponent, says:

"That he entered into a contract with the Government of the United States, in the latter part of the year 1846, for the manufacture and delivery to the Government of one thousand repeating dragoon pistols, for which the Government paid the sum of $28,150, as it appears by the accounts of this deponent; that the contract was closed in the fall of 1847 by the payment of the money and the delivery of the arms; that the arms were constructed with as much economy as this deponent was able to exercise in their manufacture, and that he attended personally to their construction; that he now has the accounts before him of the disbursements made for materials, work, and incidental expenses in their construction, and that this deponent paid $27,063 81, as the accounts show, leaving a balance of $786 19, after these payments were made, with which to pay traveling expenses and the personal expenses of this deponent, and his attention to the manufacture for nine months. And this deponent saith that the whole profit which he received out of the contract was not sufficient to pay his board bills at his boarding-house, and that he was compelled to postpone their payment till he could get the money from another source. And this deponent further saith, that since the year 1847 he has supplied the Government with four thousand pistols, and that the accounts show that the Government was supplied with the three thousand, before the last thousand, at an actual loss of profit to this deponent of more than $2,000; but that he continued to supply the arms under this constant loss for the purpose of submitting them to the test of actual service, and benefiting by the experience which could thus be gained. And this deponent further saith, that the profit on the last thousand arms sold to the Government is not equal to the loss of profit resulting from the contract with the Government to supply the three thousand arms which were sold to the Government next before this last contract was executed, as it appears by a comparison of the cost with the prices at the times of the respective contracts."

How does this statement make the case appear, when compared with that of his opponents who made it out, by their calculations, that Colonel Colt had been reaping large profits when he had actually been losing money? The false statement of his great profits and his vast accumulation of property would never have been suffered to go uncontradicted, or without refutation, on to the records of the Patent Office, had Colonel Colt, or his counsel, been present at the time. They were not there, either of them. His opponents, of course, had it all their own way. The examination was ex parte, and they swore to what they pleased; and his application for the renewal of his patent was rejected. There is one point here which, it is believed, has not been generally understood.

The patent I have referred to, an application for the extension of which was under consideration by the Commissioner when the above examination was had, was not the same as that for the extension of which an application is now before the Senate. This is the patent for the pistol itself. The other was for the rammer with the compound lever. Therefore, the assertion sometimes made, that Colonel Colt came to Congress to ask for an extension which had been refused to be granted by the Commissioner of Patents, is not true. I will now show, in brief, and by unimpeachable testimony, that the declaration made before the Commissioner, that Colonel Colt had accumulated $1,000,000 by means of his patent, is equally void of truth.

When we reflect that the statement of Colonel Colt's alleged wealth was ex parte, founded on vague, and at best assumed, grounds, without being questioned, and made, too, by interested opponents determined to use all means to divest him of his patent, no doubt can rest in the mind of a candid and intelligent man, that the statement was a sheer fallacy.

To what has already been said permit me to add facts stated by Messrs. Luther P. Sargeant and William Fuller, sworn to before the district court of the United States for the southern district of New York, in January, 1854. Mr. Sargeant has been the managing agent of Colonel Colt since the year 1847, and is intimately acquainted with all the details of his business. With this gentleman there could be scarcely a possibility of mistake, and his character for uprightness and integrity places his testimony beyond the reach of suspicion. He states that the value of Colonel Colt's property, as near as he could estimate it, was $335,000, including that, of every description, connected with his manufacture, besides which he had about $20,000, and that his contracts and engagements, on account of his armory, would require to meet them a much larger sum. Here, sir, is a reliable account made up from books and figures, and not from estimates and vague conjecture. And there is some difference between the two sums—the one an imaginary $1,000,000, and the other only a real substantial $335,000, a rather heavy discount of about sixty-five per cent. This amount would just about cover the actual loss sustained some fifteen or sixteen years since, minus the interest for that period, and the time and money expended by the patentee on his invention from its incipient state twenty-four years since. The other witness, whose veracity will not be called in question by any one who knows him, has been employed as chief inspector of arms in Colonel Colt's armory since 1847. He testifies that all the outlays of Colonel Colt have been necessary to enable him to perfect his arms and to reduce their cost. "The whole of this work," he says, "has been done by Colonel Colt in pursuance of a plan laid out by him at an early day in the manufacture, which, when carried out, will subdivide the processes of manufacture, and the machinery by which the result is produced, so that no machine will be required to perform more than one operation, and consequently the highest degree of perfection will be reached. To accomplish this result will require many times more machinery than is now employed, and at least three times the capital now invested; but, when it is accomplished, the most perfect arms can be made at so low a price as to compete successfully with spurious imitations made by a cheap process as this deponent believes." He further states that the tools and machinery being of novel character, their cost has been very great, and that they would not be worth more than one fifth of that cost to be applied to any other business.

But we hear it declared and reiterated along the ranks of the opponents of this bill, that Colonel Colt owns a tremendous armory in England, of great value, and by means of which he is literally coining money. In short, sir, there are certain lovers and retailers of the marvelous, who seem to attribute to his patent invention all the wonderful properties of Alladin's lamp. But, sir, what have we to do with that? Suppose he had, by his enterprise, built up in London, under British patronage, a large manufactory of his arms, and by it accumulated a princely fortune—what have we to do with that? What business is that of ours?

Sir, the British Government will regulate its affairs under its own patent laws. That Government does not require of us an account of what a patentee may make out of his patent invention here, in order to determine how much he may be entitled to realize there. For an invention, in this country, the patentee is, under the law, and in justice, entitled to the opportunity to realize from his invention here an amount equivalent to full compensation, and a reward in proportion to the benefits that invention may have conferred on the public—on this public. Whatever privileges or immunities any other Government may have conferred on the same patentee for the same invention is no question and no concern of ours. But, sir, this statement of Colonel Colt's wealth and his great armory in London is, like the other, the mere baseless fabric of a vision. Sir, he owns no armory there. He has not there the ownership of a solitary square foot of land, nor of a stone, or a brick, or an inch of any other material, in a building on any foreign soil. In London, sir, where this much talked of armory is located, he occupies, on sufferance, an old Government building. In that building he has placed some tools and machinery, with a limited number of workmen, as the commencement of an armory. This stock of tools and machinery—the value of them—go to swell the amount of his whole property to $335,000, already stated. Thus stands the business, as proved beyond dispute.

Mr. President, as fast as profits have accrued, they have been applied to improvements in the patented arm, and in tools and machinery to carry out those improvements and to reduce the cost for the benefit of the public. These are his stock in trade, valuable only in his hands, for the manufacture of the genuine cast steel repeating arms. Independent of these, Colonel Colt has little or nothing in the form of property. Deprive him of his patent and you destroy the value of these in a great measure, and leave him to commence life anew in a state of comparative poverty, after having spent more than twenty of the best years of his existence on improvements highly honorable to himself and his country, and of incalculable benefit to the public. And this, by some people, is miscalled justice. I consider it wrong, arbitrary, and oppressive.

Sir, attempts have been made, in a very strenuous manner, to cast contumely and reproach on the conduct of Colonel Colt, mainly through attacks on his friends. It would not become me in this place to point out the source of these attacks, nor the actors in the drama. The ultimate object, I may be permitted to say, was to wrest from him what I consider to be his natural and legal right. I regret that the attempt has been successful, while I rejoice that the result leaves no stain on the character or conduct of him and his friends; that not a shadow of proof has been elicited to tarnish their fame or their honor.

Mr. President, the declaration may be boldly made here and elsewhere, and that without hazard, and with the strictest regard for truth, that no more honest, honorable, and high-minded man breathes the breath of life than Colonel Samuel Colt. From his youth up, his life has been almost one continued series of vicissitude and change. Sometimes in prosperity, but more frequently in adversity; he has enjoyed the one with the zest of a man who knows how to appreciate the blessings and pleasures of life, and in the other, when the dark clouds of adversity rested on him, and seemed to shut out all hope for the future, he has manfully struggled with apparent destiny, conquered all obstacles, and emerged again triumphantly to the light of day. Sir, had not Colonel Colt been a man of the most fertile genius, of indomitable energy, and perseverance, with a mind well endowed with some of nature's best and noblest gifts, and conscious uprightness and rectitude, he would long since have been borne down by the hostile forces arrayed against him, and crushed into the earth beneath the heels of his mercenary foes. But, sir, he is indomitable—destroy him, and he rises, like the Phenix from his ashes, with renewed life and vigor. Like the geometrical arch—with the increase of the burden you enhance his power of resistance.

Mr. President, it is not my intention to eulogize Colonel Colt. His standing, as a man of honor and a gentleman, is too well known to require it. His reputation, also, as the inventor of the arm which bears his name, is world-wide, and his genius, his talents, and his valuable services to the public are well and truly appreciated, except by the harpies who, to increase their wealth, would prey on his vitals, and by the ignorant and prejudiced, who either know not how to appreciate merit, cast it aside as a thing of naught, or knowing it, sully their own consciences, by regarding it with envy and hatred, and refusing for it its just reward. Through an array of hosts of the latter description of men has he been compelled to make his way. Against them his probity and honor have enabled him to stand firm, and justice for him has usually triumphed, as it will in the future. But, sir, let the final results, as to his pecuniary interests, be what they may, one thing is certain, he will have the proud consciousness of having made valuable gifts to his country and the world, and with having acquired an enviable fame, which will very long survive when the names of his opponents and persecutors shall have perished. While living, he will be honored by all true-hearted men.

THE TARIFF.

SPEECH OF HON. HENRY WILSON,

OF MASSACHUSETTS,

IN THE SENATE, March 1, 1855,

On the motion of Hon. JOHN M. CLAYTON to strike out of the Civil and Diplomatic bill the sections relating to the Tariff.

Mr. WILSON said:

Mr. PRESIDENT: I shall vote against the motion submitted by the honorable Senator from Delaware, [Mr. CLAYTON,] to strike out so much of the bill as relates to the modification of the tariff of 1846, and I shall vote for this portion of the bill as it came from the House of Representatives and from the Committee on Finance. This proposed modification of the tariff comes to us supported by a decisive vote of the Representatives of the people, by men of all parties, and from all sections of the country. It comes to us at a time when political considerations and political combinations can have little influence upon the action of Congress. I know this measure is not a perfect one, but the proposed changes are in the right direction, and I shall support them because, in my judgment, they will be beneficial not only to my own State, but to the whole country.

But, sir, I do not expect, I cannot expect, after the manifestations I have witnessed here to-day that this tariff provision will be retained by the Senate. Honorable Senators, who are hostile to this proposed modification of the act of 1846, seem determined to defeat it or to defeat altogether the civil and diplomatic appropriation bill. I may be mistaken, sir, but I think I see influences at work in this Chamber from the other end of Pennsylvania avenue to defeat this measure, a measure which comes to us sanctioned by the voice of the House of Representatives. Power, sir, does not like to relax its hold upon the hoarded millions now locked up in the national Treasury. Men, who have looked with hungry eye upon a Treasury overflowing with surplus millions, do not wish to see the sources from which those coveted millions are derived dried up. Then, sir, I fear that now, as in times past, political ambition is not unwilling to sacrifice the business interests of the country in the hope to win political power. The measure is doomed—the hopes of the people are destined to be disappointed.

Sir, the honorable Senator from Ohio, [Mr. WADE,] who has just taken his seat, declares that this tariff measure has been sprung upon the country. He is not prepared to vote upon the proposition. Upon this question he assures us he is, indeed, a "Know-Nothing." I am sorry, sir, although I have a great deal of regard for gentlemen who bear that charmed name, that we have so many "Know-Nothings" here upon this question. My friend from Ohio, who has indulged in some fine declamation about protecting the labor of the country, is not ready to vote for this proposition because it has been sprung upon the country. Does not the Senator know that the business interests of the country imperiously demand an essential modification of the act of 1846? Does he not know that the President called the attention of Congress to the subject in his first annual message, in December, 1853, and that the Secretary of the Treasury made a report in favor of a modification of the tariff? Does he not know that the President again called the attention of Congress to the subject at the beginning of the present session, and that the Secretary of the Treasury again made a report in favor of an essential change? Does he not know that the Committee of Ways and Means in the House have had the whole question under consideration for weeks, and that the measure, as it now stands, received the sanction of gentlemen versed in the financial and business interests of the country? Sir, the attention of the country has been called during the last eighteen months to the revision of the tariff, yet the Senator from Ohio, and other honorable Senators, are now taken by surprise at the action of the House of Representatives.

The honorable Senator from New York [Mr. SEWARD] undertakes to read a lecture to the House of Representatives for their action in placing this tariff proposition upon the civil and diplomatic bill. Sir, the Senator should be a little more charitable towards this action of the House of Representatives. It so happens, sir, that the Senator from New York, in 1851, voted to put upon the civil and diplomatic appropriation bill of that year the river and harbor bill. Yes, sir, the Senator from New York, who now rebukes the members of the House of Representatives for putting upon the civil and diplomatic bill the proposed tariff amendments, voted, with two other Senators, in 1851, to incorporate into the civil and diplomatic bill of that year a river and harbor appropriation bill, which was quite as inconsistent with the bill of that year as this action of the House can be this year. The Senator from New York goes quite as far as any other Senator in the extreme latitude with which he construes the rules of the Senate or the powers of the Constitution. I do not, I confess, like this mode of legislation, but it has been so often resorted to for the purpose of carrying measures through Congress that no one should be at all surprised at the action of the House in this case. The people desire an essential modification of the revenue laws, and I think their Representatives have acted in obedience to their will in incorporating into the bill this modification of the act of 1846.

The Senator from Maryland [Mr. PEARCE] and the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. BRODHEAD] have made estimates in regard to the operations of this proposed measure upon the revenue of the country. The honorable Senators see in this measure a plan for the depletion of the Treasury. Pass this measure, and the vaults of your Treasury, now running over with gold, will be speedily empty. Well, sir, if these predictions should be verified, I shall not complain, and I am quite sure the business men of the country, who have felt the pressure which has borne so heavily upon them, while your sub-treasury has hoarded up twenty-five millions of gold, will not complain. I wish to see your coffers of hoarded gold emptied—not by squandering the money already there, but by diminishing the sources which supply those surplus millions. I wish to see the revenue reduced to less than $50,000,000 annually from all sources, and the expenditures greatly reduced, and I shall vote for this measure in the hope that the anticipated reduction will be realized. But I would suggest to the honorable Senators from Maryland and Pennsylvania, that they should be a little cautious in regard to these predictions and estimated deficiences. In 1846, when the tariff of 1842 was superseded by the act of that year, the chairman of the Committee on Finance, and other distinguished Senators, predicted, with the utmost confidence, that the Treasury would be beggared by the change proposed. The predictions so confidently made by the Senators of that day have been proved entirely incorrect by subsequent events. If the Senators from Maryland and Pennsylvania will glance over the congressional debates during the past twenty-five or thirty years, they will find that ninety-nine of every one hundred of the predictions which have been made in regard to the operations of the tariff upon the revenues of the country, have been falsified by the facts which time has disclosed. The Senate and the country should receive with caution these estimates which honorable Senators have chosen to indulge in.

But the Senator from Delaware [Mr. CLAYTON] tells us that we should not act upon this tariff at this session—that we should leave the subject to the next Congress. There has been, he tells us, a revolution in the composition of the House of Representatives, greater than has ever been known before in the history of the country. It is true, as the Senator from Delaware suggests, the next House will have a decided majority opposed to the majority here in the Senate. This very difference may make it more difficult to make any changes in the tariff. There may be a contest between the two Houses, into which political considerations may enter, and this question of the tariff, in the right adjustment of which the business of the country is so intimately concerned, may be sacrificed by political interests and combinations connected with the elections of 1856.

I think the time has come, sir, to take this question out of the political contests of party warfare. The business interests of the country have too often been sacrificed to the supposed interests of party. I know that, in 1846, the best interests of the manufacturers of my section of the country were trifled with, sacrificed for political considerations. Men connected with the leading manufacturing interests assembled at the capital to watch over those interests, and the tariff of 1846 would have been so framed as to more effectually protect them had not the politicians, who wished to carry the question into the election of 1848, refused to coöperate with them. And I fear now, sir, that this measure is to be sacrificed, and thrown over to the next Congress, to be involved in the next presidential election.

In Massachusetts, and I think I may say in New England, we desire a change in the tariff laws. We of Massachusetts are in favor of making the raw materials that enter into the manufactures free of duty, or placing upon them a mere nominal duty. We want free wool and free dye-stuffs. We want those articles out of which we make cotton and woolen goods duty free. We want raw silk and hides duty free. Last year we imported into the country more than two million four hundred and twenty-one thousand hides, valued at $11,942,000. Out of these hides are manufactured millions of pairs of shoes and boots in Massachusetts and New England. There is no reason why these foreign hides should not come in free of duty. All restrictions which weigh heavily upon the manufacturing interests should be speedily removed, and all raw materials used for manufacturing purposes should be placed on the free list. Then, sir, we want the duties reduced upon those articles of prime necessity which enter into the general consumption of the masses. Coal should be placed on the free list. The duty on sugar, now thirty per cent., should be reduced. The people of the United States pay annually, it is estimated, not less than $10,000,000 in the enhanced value of sugars alone. This enormous burden is imposed upon the people for the direct benefit of some thirteen hundred sugar growers. By this bill sugar will be taxed twenty-four per cent., yet the Senator from Louisiana, [Mr. BENJAMIN] denounces it as a bill which confers great benefits upon the manufacturers of textile fabrics.

The Senator from Delaware [Mr. CLAYTON] thinks the passage of this measure will put the knife to the throats of millions of sheep. The Senator from New York [Mr. SEWARD] is also very anxious to protect the wool-growing interests of the country. These distinguished Senators seem filled with the most gloomy apprehensions about the fate of the seventy millions of sheep that range over the country. These millions of sheep will not be sent to the shambles, even should this bill become a law. It seems to me very strange that we cannot raise wool just as cheaply upon our cheap lands in America as it can be raised on the costly lands of the Old World. I believe that the interests of the wool-grower would be promoted by the repeal or material reduction of the duty on wool.

At this time the woolen interests of New England are sadly depressed. Of sixteen hundred looms in New England, which manufacture broad cloth, nearly fifteen hundred, I am told, are not now in use for that purpose.

The Senator from Ohio [Mr. WADE] has repeated again the old story of protection to American labor. He thinks American labor will suffer if this measure passes, if the act of 1846 shall be essentially modified. I think American labor will be best protected by taxing all the necessaries of life lightly, placing the raw materials which enter into our manufactures on the free list, raising revenue to support the Government upon articles that come in competition with our manufactures, and upon the luxuries of life which are consumed by the more wealthy classes of society; by improving our harbors and rivers, and extending and completing our lines of internal communication, so that the commercial, manufacturing, and agricultural sections of the country may be brought into close and cheap connection with each other. By this policy will American labor be protected and American interests permanently promoted.

Mr. BRODHEAD replied.

Mr. WILSON. Mr. President, the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. BRODHEAD] misunderstood me altogether, if he understood me to allude to any anticipated conflict between the Senate and the House of Representatives upon any question concerning slavery, whether it be the repeal of the fugitive slave law or the restoration of the Missouri compromise. When those questions come up here, I shall be as ready to meet them as any other Senator. Sir, I made no allusion whatever, direct or indirect, to the subject of slavery. I did not wish to thrust that question into this debate. Whenever it is introduced here I shall meet it, and freely express my opinions, and freely give my votes. Everybody will know just where to find me whenever any question comes up concerning slavery.

The Senator from Pennsylvania congratulates Senators from the South on the union of Massachusetts with the South in support of this measure. Massachusetts will not shrink from the support of wise and patriotic measures through fear of any rebukes the Senator from Pennsylvania may assume to administer. Massachusetts is here to maintain her interests and her rights. She has no favors to ask of the South or of Pennsylvania. She will never, in the persons of those who represent her here this day, follow the example now set her by Pennsylvania, and bow her head low in the dust and beg for a little protection on her interests, pleading her servility to southern demands as a reason why southern Senators should now stand by her.

The Senator from Pennsylvania alluded to a remark made by me concerning the doctrine of protection. Sir, I have no apprehensions whatever that we shall come to a system of direct taxation. Whatever professions men may have made in the past, whatever professions they may make now, either North or South, we shall not come to direct taxation in your day or mine. I take it that we must have from forty to sixty millions of dollars annually, to be raised mostly by duties assessed upon the imports of the country. What I contend for, is, that upon all the articles that enter into the general consumption of the country, there should be a light tax, or that they should come entirely free of duty. What I wish to see is, that the raw material which enters into the manufactures of the country shall come in free of duty. We want free wool and free dye-stuffs. The manufacturing interests of the country demand it. The commercial interests of the country demand it, and, in my humble judgment, the agricultural interests of the country would be promoted by it. Yes, sir, we want all those articles, that enter as raw materials into the manufactures of the country, free of duty; so that the country can stand on an equality in the markets of the world with the other nations of the world. The Senator from Pennsylvania defends, as he should defend, the interests of his State; but Pennsylvania has had more protection than any other section of the country, and she has more to-day. There is a duty of thirty per cent. on iron, and at least fifteen per cent. more protection by the cost of importation. The interests of Pennsylvania will be cared for under this bill. She will have for her iron not less than thirty-five per cent. protection in reality. The Senator desires that the seventeen thousand miles of railway——

Mr. COOPER. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. WILSON. Certainly.

Mr. COOPER. How does he show that Pennsylvania will receive a protection of thirty-five per cent. on her iron? It is a matter of some interest to me, and I should like to know how it is.

Mr. WILSON. I will answer the Senator. She will receive, under this bill, twenty-four per cent. of protection. The cost of importation is not less than fifteen per cent. That gives a protection to Pennsylvania in the article of iron of nearly forty per cent. Now, sir, we have seventeen thousand miles of railway under process of construction. Those railways are mainly in the new States of the West and Southwest. The interests of the country, the commercial, manufacturing, and agricultural interests of the country, require that these railways should be speedily completed; and the idea that the railroad interest is to be checked, is to be repressed for the purpose of developing the railroad iron resources of Pennsylvania, a State that does not make railroad iron enough to keep in repairs twenty-one thousand miles of the railways now in existence, it seems to me is a singular doctrine to advance here or elsewhere. Depend upon it, sir, the country will not stand still or consent to keep pace with the growth of the Pennsylvania railroad iron establishments.

But the Senator thinks that it is a strange doctrine to come from Massachusetts, that we care little for protection. I do not mean to say, sir, that Massachusetts does not care for protection; I admit that she desires it upon some articles which she manufactures, but your tariff of 1846 is a real discrimination against her on some of those articles, and she wishes that corrected.

But, sir, this talk about protection, the history of the past twenty-five years shows, has been mainly for political effect. Every public man knows that it has been so. I think the interests of the labor of this country will be best promoted by living as near as we can practically to the doctrines of sound political economy.

The Senator from Pennsylvania is in great trouble about an arrangement between Massachusetts and the representatives from the South. Sir, I do not know that any arrangement has been made, but I am free to say that, upon this question of the tariff, I am just as ready to make an arrangement with the South as I should be with the State of Pennsylvania, or any other State. I do not know that any arrangements are made, but I am not to be frightened from voting according to my convictions by any allusions of that kind, by my friend from Pennsylvania, or any other Senator upon this floor.

I support this measure because, in my judgment, any legislation of Congress which tends towards freedom of trade, towards liberalizing the revenue laws of the country, is an advantage to its capital and labor. I believe it sincerely, and the experience of the past proves it to be true. I believe this tariff provision is doomed to defeat. My apprehensions are that it is to be thrown over into the next Congress. There will, unquestionably, be a large majority, an overwhelming majority, of the next House of Representatives opposed to the present Administration.

Mr. SEWARD. Will my honorable friend allow me to ask him a question? Has he less confidence in that House of Representatives than in the present one?

Mr. WILSON. I have as much confidence in the next House of Representatives as I can have in the present one. I certainly have more political sympathy with it. I suppose it will have a decided, an overwhelming, majority against the present Administration; but in the next House of Representatives, and in the Senate, we are to have repeated the lessons of the past. Questions connected with the next presidency will come up, and will have more or less effect upon all subjects which may be brought before the two Houses. I do not want to see this question of the tariff mingled up any longer in political contests. The business interests of the country have been too often sacrificed to advance the political purposes of the public men of the country. I am willing to take the bill as it comes to us from the House of Representatives, and I shall vote for it, although I have apprehensions that the motion made by the honorable Senator from Delaware [Mr. CLAYTON] will succeed.

TEXAS DEBT BILL.

OF TENNESSEE,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

February, 6, 1855,

On the bill to provide for the payment of such Creditors of the late Republic of Texas as are comprehended in the act of Congress of September 9, 1850.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee, said:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: I move to amend the first section by striking out the words "eight millions five hundred," and inserting the words "six millions five hundred and fifty." The amendment which I propose will, if adopted, appropriate the $5,000,000, being the principal of Texan indemnity bonds issued under the boundary act of September, 1850, but retained in the Treasury because the Texan creditors have not complied with the conditions of that act, requiring them to file releases against the United States—$1,250,000 being interest at the rate of five per cent. per annum, from the date of the bonds to the 1st of January, 1856, and $300,000, being for premium at the rate of six per cent., that being the rate of premium which is now being paid for the redemption of such portions of Texan five per cent. bonds issued and delivered to Texas in 1851 upon presentation at the Treasury of the United States.

The bill provides that $8,500,000 shall be appropriated and distributed among the creditors of Texas, provided that they shall, in consideration of such payment, release the Government of the United States from the entire debt which they now claim the Government is liable for. Now, sir, if I could believe that this Government, by their action with regard to Texas, had assumed these debts, or made themselves liable for the payment, I would vote most cheerfully to pay an amount out of the United States Treasury sufficient to pay the liabilities; for, sir, I wish that the Government shall deal justly, fairly, honorably, and honestly, with all persons, and that they shall discharge, to the last dollar, all the liabilities for which they are legally bound.

The ground upon which this appropriation is based, is the assumption that, by the annexation of Texas, and by her incorporation into the Union, and by the act of 1850, proposing to settle the boundaries between her and the Territories of the United States, by those various acts we have virtually and legally assumed upon ourselves the liabilities of Texas, and particularly, say gentlemen, that portion of it for which the customs revenue of Texas was pledged.

Mr. Chairman, I cannot perceive, I have been unable to see, how the debt of Texas, for which her customs revenue was pledged, is of any higher grade or of any more binding force upon Texas, or upon this Government, than the debt for which she had pledged her faith. When this or any other Government, in my opinion, pledges its faith for the payment of a debt, the amount of money included within that pledge is a lien upon all of its resources, whether derived from customs, direct taxes, or property. Then, sir, if I am right in that, we are no more bound for that portion of the debt for which the custom-house receipts were pledged than for all the balance of it.

But it is argued that Texas, under the annexation resolution, having transferred her custom-houses and custom revenues to this Government, after having previously pledged them to the payment of certain debts and liabilities which she had created, those debts and liabilities follow the transfers into the hands of the Government of the United States. Sir, I understand it to be one of the clearest principles of law, that when an individual being in debt sells his property to a third party, if it is a bona fide transaction, in which the purchaser pays a sound price, then there is no liability or responsibility upon the purchaser for the debts of the person from whom he purchased the property, unless—suggests my friend from South Carolina [Mr. BOYCE]—it be mortgaged. Sir, I ask if this Government can mortgage a thing that is not in existence? Could Texas mortgage a thing that was not in existence? Can an individual mortgage a thing which is not in existence? Now, were the custom-house revenues of Texas in existence, could she sell the duties of the next year? Why, sir, she was engaged in a struggle with the country from which she had separated herself for her very existence. Suppose that that Government had made a conquest of Texas, where would have been her sovereignty? Where would have been her faith? Where would have been her custom-houses? Where would have been her power to levy duties? Would not all the resources of that Republic have passed into the hands of Mexico?

Then, sir, again, suppose that Texas had remained independent, and had repealed her custom-house laws, and had resorted to direct taxation, or the disposal and sale of the public lands to support her Government, where would have been the mortgage? Where would have been the power to have enforced it? But, sir, I hold that this Government, by annexing Texas and incorporating her into this Union, gave to Texas, and gave to the creditors of Texas, a sound and valuable consideration for the transfer of her custom-houses and customs revenue, in the guarantee of her permanent existence and independence. In placing her upon that permanent basis which this Government itself enjoys, we guarantied to her her existence and her independence, and we have maintained it so far. Now, sir, I appeal to you and to this committee, to say whether that was not a fair and bona fide equivalent for the custom-house revenues received by this Government? Suppose that, instead of annexation and incorporation into this Government, Texas had transferred to the United States her custom-houses, and her revenues from that source, upon condition that the United States would guaranty her independent and separate existence against Mexico and all the world, would that not have been a fair equivalent for the custom-houses? Would it not have been better for the creditors than to have left them with Texas? Would any person have said that, under such a compact as that, this Government would have been bound for the debt of Texas?

But, Mr. Chairman, admitting, for a moment, that we were bound; and if that be conceded, I think that it must then follow that we took those revenues of Texas derived from her customs, with all the incumbrances and all the liabilities to which they were subject. Now, in the first place, Texas relied mainly upon her customs revenue for means to defray the current expenses of her Government in an independent position. Then, sir, if we took her with these incumbrances on her, by all fair and legitimate rules, we should go into an account and see what it has cost us to defray the expenses incident to Texas since she has been annexed, and then strike the balance. It appears to me, that even upon the assumed ground that these custom-house resources were mortgaged by the State of Texas, that course would be the correct one to pursue. I have not looked into the facts as to the amount received from customs revenue through the custom-houses of Texas since she has been annexed to this Government; but I suppose that it will not be contended that the revenue from that source has been equal to or beyond the proportionate and legitimate expenses which we have incurred in consequence of the annexation of Texas.

Again, sir, by the annexation resolution it was provided that Texas should retain all of her public lands and other property to pay her debts. Now, sir, by the boundary act of 1850 we proposed to Texas that if she would relinquish her claim to certain territory which she claimed, this Government, in consideration of that relinquishment, would pay to her the sum of $10,000,000, in a stock running fourteen years and bearing interest at five per centum per annum. Texas having given her assent, $5,000,000 of these bonds were issued, under the law dated January 1, 1851, and due on 1st January, 1865. This last $5,000,000 is deposited and retained in the Treasury of the United States, because certain stipulations of the act of 1850 have not been complied with by the creditors of Texas.

By the terms of the annexation resolutions of 1845, Texas entered into a solemn compact with this Government, that her invaluable public lands should be retained by her, and appropriated to the payment of her debts. By the boundary act of September, 1850, the United States purchased of Texas her claim—and it was a bare claim, the most worthless of all her public lands—for which the United States agreed to pay Texas $10,000,000. This was for only a part of the pledged public lands of Texas, but for which the United States agreed to pay an amount sufficient to pay the entire debt of Texas, or very nearly so, leaving her all of her most fertile and desirable lands within her present boundaries relieved and unembarrassed. Not only so, but Texas being annexed and made one of the United States, thousands of our people were induced to go there who never would have identified their fortunes with the Republic of Texas. We bought her worthless lands to free her from debt, and furnished her with many of the best of our people as purchasers of her better lands and permanent citizens.

Then, sir, if there were some plausibility in the argument that we incurred these responsibilities, yet, having purchased her property at a price which was, perhaps, beyond its value, in a bona fide transaction—at a price which would have liquidated that debt—I think that we are released from all responsibility, and even from all stigma which might attach to their non-payment. And it is upon these grounds, and for these reasons, that I cannot give my support to the bill as it is now before the committee. The amount of $8,500,000 in the bill passed by the Senate, is made up of the $5,000,000 of bonds, and the interest at five per cent. per annum on that $5,000,000 for the fourteen years the bonds have to run, $3,500,000. The amount which I propose to insert in the bill ($6,550,000) is made up of the Texas indemnity bonds issued under the act of September 9, 1850, dated January 1, 1851, and due in fourteen years after date—January 1, 1865—bearing interest at the rate of five per cent. per annum, now deposited in the Treasury of the United States, and worth in the market six per cent. premium. This six per cent. premium on $5,000,000 makes $300,000. The reason why I assume the rate of premium at six per cent. is, because, by an advertisement now in the papers of this city, the Secretary of the Treasury gives notice to all holders of any part of the $5,000,000 of bonds which were delivered to Texas, of the same character and description as these, that he will pay them the face or par value of the bonds which they may present, with all interest accrued at the time of presentation, and six per cent. premium on the face value of these bonds.

This rate of premium on the $5,000,000 is $300,000. This bill proposes that it shall not be executed until Texas, by an act of her Legislature, shall give her assent to its provision; and I assume that it will take the greater part, if not the whole, of the present year before the assent of Texas will be obtained, and that the Treasury will not be able to pay out the money, if appropriated, before the 1st of January next, which will be five years from the date of the bonds. Consequently there will be five years' interest due at that time, at five per cent. per annum, which makes $1,250,000. This, when added to the $5,000,000 of bonds, and the $300,000 of premium, makes the whole amount $6,550,000, which sum I have moved to insert in lieu of the amount now in the bill. This amendment will be, I hope, sustained by the committee and by the House, and will become the law, so as that this Government will have paid over its indebtedness to Texas, and will have got rid of the matter.

I was here, Mr. Chairman, when Texas was annexed. I supported that proposition. I was here when she was admitted into this Confederacy, and voted for that, too. I was here when the war was declared to support her independence, and to give her that protection which we have pledged ourselves she should receive at our hands. I sustained all the propositions which passed the Congress of the United States to prosecute, vigorously and efficiently, that war. I was here, and voted for the boundary bill. And, sir, when I look back I cannot bring my mind to the conclusion that, in any one act I have performed in all these various cases, I assumed the debt of Texas, or pledged these United States to pay that debt. We do, however, owe the $5,000,000, with the accrued interest thereon; and I am willing to pay a fair premium for this stock.

THE COLLINS STEAMERS.

OF TENNESSEE,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

February 16, 1855.

The House being in the Committee of the Whole, (under the five-minute rule,) and having under consideration the bill making appropriations for the transportation of the United States mail, by Ocean Steamers and otherwise, during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1856,

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee, said:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: With the cost of the Collins steamers, the expense of running them, with the rates of fare for passengers, and the receipts for freight, we have nothing to do. That, sir, is the private business of E. K. Collins & Co. With them I have no more to do than I have with the amount of goods imported by Stuart, the merchant, of New York, or of any other merchant in that city.

My business upon this subject, as a Representative of a tax-paying constituency, and as a legislator, is to inquire whether the services rendered by E. K. Collins & Co. are worth, in the first place, the money which we pay them; and, in the second place, whether or not we can get clear of any portion of that expense without violating the contract with that company, or giving them cause of complaint. In 1847, Collins & Co. came here and made a proposition, in accordance with which, without altering one word, Congress directed by law that the Secretary of the Navy should close the contract upon their own terms, which were, that they should carry the mails twenty round trips a year, and receive for it $385,000 from the United States—being $19,250 for each round trip. They commenced the services in April, 1850, and in 1852 came back to Congress and represented that they could not carry out the contract and perform the services at the compensation they were receiving. The proposition was successfully advocated in Congress, that if you would increase the number of trips by six, and increase the compensation to $33,000 the round trip, they would carry out the contract and perform the services.

In both cases one of the strongest arguments urged was, that it was the building up of your Navy, and would supersede the necessity of a direct expenditure in increasing the Navy establishment. That argument has now no force, for I believe no one now seriously contends that these vessels will answer for war purposes.

Again, you were told, when this compensation was increased, that the increased mail facilities would so increase the correspondence between the two countries, and, consequently, so increase the amount of postage, as to remunerate the country for the extra expenses paid. Now, sir, after two years' experience under this new arrangement of increased trips and increased compensation, how stands the account? Well, here it is:

Amount paid to E. K. Collins & Co. for mail transportation from New York to Liverpool, for the year ending June 30, 1853	$858,000 00
Amount of postages received from mails carried by Collins line for the same year	192,313 87
Net loss to the United States in 1853	$665,686 13
Amount paid E. K. Collins & Co. for similar service, for the year ending June 30, 1854	$858,000 00
Net receipts of postages from Collins line for the same year	153,377 61
Net loss to the United States for the year 1854,	$704,622 39

And a falling off from the receipts for postages from this ocean mail steam line from the preceding year of the pretty little sum of $38,936 26.

I would thank the advocates of this line to inform me, this House, and the tax-paying people of the country, when the revenues from the line will meet the compensation paid to these especial favorites of Congress.

E. K. Collins & Co. commenced this service on April 27, 1850, and from that date to June 30, 1854, have received from the people's Treasury the sum of	$2,835,406 57
The whole amount of net revenue received for ocean postages on mails carried by Collins line for the same period	734,466 01
Net loss to the United States in four years	$2,100,940 56

Thus we see that, for the first two years under this new arrangement of an increased number of trips and increased compensation, the amount paid out by the Treasury over the amount received from postages on mails carried by this line was only $1,370,308 52; and the total amount paid to E. K. Collins & Co., over and above the amount of postages received by the United States from mails transported across the Atlantic ocean since the commencement of their contract, is only the trifling and insignificant sum, in the estimation of legislators of enlarged and liberal views, but to the honest tax-payers, whose toils and whose labors have to foot all these bills, the enormous sum of $2,100,940 56, more than the Government price of the public lands sufficient to settle, upon homesteads of their own, of one hundred and sixty acres each, ten thousand American citizens with their wives and children, averaging six to the family, making an aggregate of sixty thousand human beings, each one of whom are as much entitled to the favors and bounty of the Government as E. K. Collins and his associates. And estimating the public lands at the actual cost to the Government of fourteen and one half cents an acre would be sufficient to provide homesteads, of one hundred and sixty acres each, to over ninety thousand free American citizens, who pay your taxes and fight your battles, who, with their wives and children, of six members to the family, would constitute a population of about five hundred and forty thousand, sufficient to entitle six of your Territories to admission as sovereign States into the Union. Is this legislating for the rights and benefits of the many, or for the benefit and advantage of a favored few? And yet the same Congress which fails to pass the homestead bill will pass this bill for the benefit of the owners of these mail steamers. Sooner or later the people of the country, of the rural districts, will be aroused against this kind of partial legislation, the tendency of which is to enable the few favored objects to amass princely fortunes and establish castes and classes in this country, against the genius and principles of the Government.

LAWS OF THE UNITED STATES.

PUBLIC ACTS OF THE THIRTY-THIRD CONGRESS

OF THE

UNITED STATES,

Passed at the Second Session, which was begun and held at the City of Washington, in the District of Columbia, on Monday, the 4th day of December, 1854, and ended on Sunday, the 4th day of March, 1855.

FRANKLIN PIERCE, President; JESSE D. BRIGHT, President of the Senate pro tempore; LINN BOYD, Speaker of the House of Representatives.

PUBLIC, I.—An Act for the better preservation of Life and Property from Vessels shipwrecked on the coasts of the United States.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized to establish such additional stations on the coasts of Long Island and New Jersey, for affording aid to shipwrecked vessels thereon, to change the location of the existing stations, and to make such repairs and to furnish such apparatus and supplies as may, in his judgment, be best adapted to give effect to the objects of this act.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized to appoint a keeper, at a compensation not exceeding two hundred dollars, at each of the stations to be established under the provisions of the first section of this act, and a superintendent, who shall also have the powers and perform the duty of an inspector of the customs for each of the coasts therein mentioned, and to give said keepers and superintendents proper instructions relative to the duties to be required of them.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That no boat shall be purchased and located at any point other than on the coasts of Long Island and New Jersey, unless the same be placed in the immediate care of an officer of the Government, or unless bond shall be given by proper individuals, living in the neighborhood, conditioned for the care and preservation of the same and its application to the uses intended.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized to establish stations at such light-houses as, in his judgment, he shall deem best, and the keepers of such lights shall take charge of such boats and apparatus as may be put in their charge respectively as a part of their official duties.

APPROVED, December 14, 1854.

PUBLIC, II.—An Act to relinquish to the State of Wisconsin the Lands reserved for Salt Springs therein.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That in lieu of the "twelve salt springs with six sections of land adjoining to each," heretofore granted to the State of Wisconsin for its use by the fourth clause of the seventh section of the act entitled "An act to enable the people of Wisconsin Territory to form a constitution and State government, and for the admission of such State into the Union," approved the sixth day of August, in the year eighteen hundred and forty-six, there be, and hereby is, granted to the said State of Wisconsin, to be selected by the Legislature of said State out of any public land subject to private entry, and to be sold in such manner as the Legislature may direct for the benefit and in aid of the university of said State, and for no other purpose whatever, seventy-two sections of land: Provided, That any selections of land heretofore made under the act entitled "An act to extend the time for selecting land granted to the State of Wisconsin for saline purposes," approved the fourth day of May, eighteen hundred and fifty-two, and which shall not have been sold by the United States, and is not legally claimed by preëmption or otherwise, shall be, and hereby are, granted and confirmed to said State for the use of the university of said State as a part of the seventy-two sections hereby granted.

APPROVED, December 15, 1854.

PUBLIC, III.—An Act allowing the further Time of two years to those holding Lands by entries in the Virginia Military District in Ohio, which were made prior to the first of January, eighteen hundred and fifty-two, to have the same surveyed and patented.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the officers and soldiers of the Virginia line or Continental establishment, their heirs or assigns, entitled to bounty lands, which have, prior to the first day of January, anno Domini eighteen hundred and fifty-two, been entered within the tract reserved by Virginia between the Little Miami and Sciota rivers, for satisfying the legal bounties to her officers and soldiers upon Continental establishment, shall be allowed the time of two years from and after the passage of this act, to make and return their surveys and warrants or certified copies of warrants, to the General Land Office.

APPROVED, December 19, 1854.

PUBLIC, IV.—An Act to provide for the Extinguishment of the Title of the Chippewa Indians to the Lands owned and claimed by them in the Territory of Minnesota and State of Wisconsin, and for their domestication and civilization.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the President be, and he is hereby, authorized to cause negotiations to be entered into with the Chippewa Indians for the extinguishment of their title to all the lands owned and claimed by them in the Territory of Minnesota and State of Wisconsin, which treaties shall contain the following provisions, and such others as may be requisite and proper to carry the same into effect:

First. Granting to each head of a family, in fee-simple, a reservation of eighty acres of land, to be selected in the territory ceded, so soon as surveys shall be completed, by those entitled; which said reservation shall be patented by the President of the United States, and the patent therefor shall expressly declare that the said lands shall not be alienated or leased by the reservees, or their heirs and legal representatives, until otherwise ordered by Congress, and no change of location shall be made without the assent of the President of the United States.

Second. The annuities to which said Indians are entitled under existing treaties with the consent of said Indians, together with such as may be allowed them for the cession or cessions under the provisions of this act, shall be equally distributed and paid them at their villages, or settlements, within the limits of the ceded territory, but the President shall be invested with power to cause said annuities to be commuted from time to time for such articles of goods, provisions, stock, cattle, implements of agriculture, the clearing and fencing of land, and the erection of buildings and other improvements, as, in his discretion, will conduce most to promote their comfort, civilization, and permanent welfare.

Third. All the benefits and privileges granted to said Indians shall be extended to and enjoyed by the mixed bloods belonging to or connected with the tribe, and who shall permanently reside on the ceded lands.

Fourth. The laws of the United States and the Territory of Minnesota shall be extended over the Chippewa territory in Minnesota whenever the same may be ceded, and the same shall cease to be "Indian country," except that the lands reserved to said Indians, or other property owned by them, shall be exempt from taxation and execution, and that the act passed thirthieth June, eighteen hundred and thirty-four, "to regulate trade and intercourse with the Indian tribes," &c., be inoperative over the said ceded territory, except the twentieth section, which prohibits the introduction and sale of spirituous liquors to Indians.

Fifth. The President shall have power to prescribe and enforce such rules and regulations, not inconsistent with the foregoing provisions, as he may deem necessary for the effectual execution of the purposes of this act, which said rules and regulations shall be annually reported to Congress.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That, for the purpose of defraying the expenses of said negotiations, the sum of $10,000 be, and the same is hereby, appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

APPROVED, December 19, 1854.

PUBLIC, V.—An Act to authorize the issue of Patents to Lands in any State or Territory in certain cases.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That in case of any claim to land in any State or Territory which has heretofore been confirmed by law, and in which no provision is made by the confirmatory statute for the issue of patents, it shall and may be lawful when surveys for the land have been or may hereafter be made, to issue patents for the claims so confirmed, upon the presentation to the Commissioner of the General Land Office of plats of survey thereof duly approved by the surveyor general of any State or Territory, if the same be found correct by the said Commissioner: Provided, That such patents shall only operate as a relinquishment of title on the part of the United States, and shall in no manner interfere with any valid adverse right, if such exist, to the same land, nor be construed to preclude a legal investigation and decision by the proper judicial tribunal between adverse claimants to the same land.

APPROVED, December 22, 1854.

PUBLIC, VI.—An Act to suppress the Circulation of Small Notes, as a Currency, in the District of Columbia.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That if any person or persons, body-politic or corporate, within the District of Columbia, shall make, emit, issue, utter, sign, draw, or indorse, any bank note, promissory note, or any instrument of writing, for the payment or delivery of money, or other valuable thing, or of anything purporting to be a valuable thing, of a less amount than five dollars, to be used as a paper currency, or as a circulating medium, either as money, or in lieu of money or of any other currency, every such person, and every member, officer, or agent of such body-politic or corporate, concerned in, or assenting to such making, emitting, issuing, uttering, signing, drawing, or indorsing as aforesaid, for any of the purposes aforesaid, shall forfeit and pay the sum of ten dollars for each and every such bank note, promissory note, or instrument of writing so made, issued, emitted, uttered, signed, drawn, or indorsed, one half to the use of any person who shall sue therefor, and the other half to the county of Washington, District of Columbia. And, on the trial of any such cause, if the promissory note, bank note, or other instrument in question, be in part or in the whole printed or engraven, it shall be deemed sufficient evidence of an intention to put the same in circulation in violation of this act, unless the contrary be shown.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That it shall be unlawful for any person or persons, body-politic or corporate, to pass, or offer to pass, within the District of Columbia, any bank note, promissory note, or any instrument in writing of a less denomination or amount than five dollars, either as money, or in lieu of money or of any other currency, and any other person or persons, and every member, officer, or agent of such body-politic or corporate, violating the provisions of this section, shall forfeit and pay a sum of not less than five nor more than ten dollars for every such offense, one half to the use of the person who shall sue therefor, and the other half to the use of the county of Washington, District of Columbia.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That any person or persons, body-politic, or corporate, holding any such bank note, promissory note, or instrument in writing, may present the same for payment to the person or persons, body-politic or corporate, that made, emitted, issued, uttered, signed, drew, or indorsed the same, and if, upon such presentment, the person or persons, body-politic or corporate, that made, emitted, issued, uttered, signed, drew, or indorsed the same, neglect or refuse to redeem the same in gold or silver, such party so neglecting or refusing shall forfeit and pay the sum of twenty dollars for each and every such bank note, promissory note, or instrument in writing so presented, and payment thereof neglected or refused as aforesaid to the use of the person or persons, body-politic or corporate holding and presenting the same as aforesaid.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That each and every forfeiture under the foregoing provisions of this act shall be recovered in an action of debt before any justice of the peace in the District of Columbia, in the name of any person who shall sue therefor; and jurisdiction is hereby expressly given to each and every justice of the peace in the District of Columbia to try and adjudicate each and every such case.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That all contracts, whether written or verbal, hereafter made, to pay or deliver money or any valuable thing, or thing purporting to be a valuable thing, the consideration whereof may be, either wholly or in part, any paper currency or circulating medium under five dollars, or other paper or currency prohibited by this act, shall be deemed and held to be illegal and void; and the person or persons suing on such contract, shall have no remedy in any court of law or equity; and, in any suit brought on such contract, it shall be competent for the defendant, under the general issue, or any appropriate special plea, to offer evidence of the nature or of the consideration of the contract so sued on; and on the defendant's making oath that he or she has not evidence sufficient to prove the nature or consideration of such contract, it shall be the duty of the court before which such suit may be brought to require the plaintiff or plaintiffs, or either or any of them, to be sworn to testify the truth in regard to the transaction; and if the plaintiff or plaintiffs shall not be present at the trial, to compel the attendance of such plaintiff or plaintiffs as a witness or witnesses, and to postpone or continue the cause until such attendance can be procured; and if, after the whole evidence shall have been heard, it shall appear that the consideration, either wholly or in part, of the contract, was such paper currency or circulating medium prohibited by this act, judgment shall be rendered for the defendant or defendants, and for costs against the plaintiff or plaintiffs.

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That if any merchant, hotel-keeper, shop-keeper, grocer, commission merchant, or insurance agent, any owner or driver of a hackney carriage, omnibus, cart, wagon, or dray, any huckster, butcher, auctioneer, livery-stable keeper, any owner or keeper of a billiard-table or ten-pin alley, any pawnbroker, any manager or agent of theatrical or other amusements, any hawker or pedlar, transacting business under a license granted by the corporation of the city of Washington or of Georgetown, in the District of Columbia, or any other person or persons transacting business under such license, shall either receive or pay out any paper under the denomination of five dollars, or any other paper not payable in specie on demand, so prohibited as aforesaid, it shall be the duty of the attorney of the United States for the District of Columbia to sue out process in the nature of a scire facias, or to institute other suitable proceedings, in the circuit court of the District of Columbia, against such offender or offenders, returnable to the said court immediately, if said court be then sitting, or to the next term of said court, if there be then a vacation of the terms of said court, requiring such offenders to show cause why his, her, or their license aforesaid, shall not be forfeited; and on proof exhibited to said court of such receiving or paying out of such prohibited paper as aforesaid, said court shall forfeit, annul, and vacate such license, and no other license for any purpose shall be granted to such offender or offenders until one year thereafter shall have passed and expired.

SEC. 7. And be it further enacted, That it shall be the duty of the marshal of the District of Columbia, and of every constable of said District, to give information to some justice of the peace in said District of every violation of this law which may come to his knowledge.

SEC. 8. And be it further enacted, That on the trial of any cause other than a criminal prosecution, under the provisions of this act, it shall be lawful for the court before whom such cause is pending to cause to be brought before said court, and examined as a witness, any defendant to any such suit, his agent, or employer, touching the matters and things in controversy, and to employ such process to effect the object aforesaid as is usual in other cases.

SEC. 9. And be it further enacted, That this act shall be in force from and after the first day of November next; and that so much and such parts of all former acts as may be repugnant to this act be, and the same are hereby, repealed.

APPROVED, December 27, 1854.

PUBLIC, VII.—An Act vesting the Title of the United States to certain Land in the city of Cincinnati.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the title and interest of the United States to the unsold land (if any there be) in fractional section number eleven, in fractional township number four, in fractional range number one, of John Cleves Symmes's purchase of lands, within the now State of Ohio, be, and the same hereby is, vested in the corporate authorities of the city of Cincinnati, and their successors in office, and in any other occupants of the same, in severalty, upon payment to the Commissioner of the General Land Office of the minimum price of land subject to entry: Provided, That nothing in this act shall be so construed as to impair the legal or equitable rights of any other person or persons to the said land, or to any part thereof.

APPROVED, December 29, 1854.

PUBLIC, VIII.—An Act to provide for the Contingent Expenses of the Territory of Nebraska.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the sum of one thousand dollars be appropriated to defray the contingent expenses for the government of the Territory of Nebraska for the remainder of the present fiscal year, the former appropriation of fifteen hundred dollars having been drawn from the Treasury by the late Governor Burt, and by reason of his death unavailable for the present, it being the true intent and meaning of this act that not more than fifteen hundred dollars shall be expended for said contingencies within this fiscal year.

APPROVED, December 30, 1854.

PUBLIC, IX.—An Act giving the consent of Congress to the cession, by the State of Massachusetts to the State of New York, of the District of Boston Corner.

Whereas, the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, by an act of its Legislature, approved May fourteenth, A. D. eighteen hundred and fifty-three, ceded the sovereignty and jurisdiction over that portion of its Territory known as the district of Boston Corner, situated in the southwesterly corner of said Commonwealth, and westerly of the southwest line of the town of Mount Washington, in the county of Berkshire and Commonwealth aforesaid, to the State of New York; said act not to take effect, however, until the Congress of the United States shall consent to such cession and annexation.

And whereas, the State of New York, by an act of its Legislature, passed July twenty-first, A. D. eighteen hundred and fifty-three, accepted the sovereignty and jurisdiction over that portion of the Territory of Massachusetts above described, and known as the district of Boston Corner, upon the terms and subject to the provisions expressed in said act of cession, as appears by certified copies of said acts filed in the office of the Clark of the House of Representatives.

And whereas, for the better defining the limits and extent of the Territory above mentioned, commissioners on behalf of said States of Massachusetts and New York, duly authorized for that purpose, have caused an accurate survey and map to be made of said Territory, and sufficient monuments to be erected in and along its eastern boundary line, as required by said acts—a copy of said survey and map, duly authenticated, having also been filed in the office of said Clerk: Therefore—

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the consent of the Congress of the United States be, and the same is hereby, given to the said cession and annexation.

APPROVED, January 3, 1855.

PUBLIC, X.—An Act for the Liquidation of the Penitentiary indebtedness.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the sum of seven thousand one hundred and eighty-six dollars and ninety-two cents is hereby appropriated, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to enable the Secretary of the Interior to liquidate the present indebtedness of the penitentiary in the District of Columbia.

APPROVED, January 3, 1855.

PUBLIC, XI.—An Act authorizing the Washington Gas-Light Company to increase the Capital Stock of said Company.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Washington Gas-Light Company be, and the same hereby is, authorized to increase the capital stock thereof one hundred and fifty thousand dollars.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the said stock shall be subscribed on the books of said company, in shares of twenty dollars, and the holders of the said increased certificates of stock shall be held subject to the same liability as is provided in the eleventh section of the original act of incorporation, approved July eight, eighteen hundred and forty-eight.

APPROVED, January 3, 1855.

PUBLIC, XII.—An Act to amend an act entitled "An act to establish an Auxiliary Watch for the protection of Public and Private Property in the city of Washington," approved August twenty-three, eighteen hundred and forty-two.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That each of the said auxiliary watch shall receive an annual compensation of six hundred dollars, commencing with the present fiscal year, to be paid out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That so much of the above recited act, and of the act approved March three, eighteen hundred and fifty-three, fixing the compensation of the said Auxiliary Watch, be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

APPROVED, January 3, 1855.

PUBLIC, XIII.—An Act to continue in force for a limited time the provisions of the act of Congress of third March, eighteen hundred and fifty one, and the second section of its supplement of eighteenth January, eighteen hundred and fifty-four, so as to enable the Board of Land Commissioners in California to close their adjudications of Private Land Titles in that State, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the provisions of the act of Congress approved third March, eighteen hundred and fifty-one, "to ascertain and settle the private land claims in the State of California," and of the second section of the act of eighteenth January, eighteen hundred and fifty-four, continuing the same in force, be further continued in force for the term of one year, and no longer, from the third of March, eighteen hundred and fifty-five.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the United States district attorney for the northern district of California be, and he is hereby, authorized to employ assistant counsel to aid him in defending the interests of the United States in the land suits for the adjudication of such claims before the district court, at a salary not exceeding three thousand six hundred dollars per annum, and also to employ such clerical force not exceeding two persons, at a compensation of one hundred and fifty dollars per month each, the services of said assistant counsel, and the clerical force aforesaid, not to continue beyond the exigencies of the service, nor longer than the term of one year from the period of their several appointments.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That the said commissioners, or either of them, may issue the writ of subpena, requiring the attendance of witnesses before the said board, and that for any contempt in refusing obedience to such writ, the said board shall have the same power to inflict punishment now possessed by the district court of the United States.

APPROVED, January 10, 1855.

PUBLIC, XIV.—An Act to incorporate the Mutual Fire Insurance Company of the District of Columbia.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That Ulysses Ward, Thomas Blagden, F. Howard, J. C. McKelden, John Van Reswick, P. W. Browning, and Matthew G. Emery, and their present and future associates, are hereby declared to be a body-politic and corporate under the name and style of the Mutual Fire Insurance Company of the District of Columbia; and by the same name shall have perpetual succession; and shall be able to sue and be sued, plead and be impleaded, in all courts of law and equity in the District of Columbia and elsewhere; and to make and to have a common seal, and the same to break, alter, and renew at pleasure; to ordain and establish such by-laws, ordinances, and regulations, and generally to do such acts and things as are or may be necessary to carry into effect this act and promote the objects and designs of this corporation.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the purposes and designs of this corporation shall be to insure the respective dwelling houses and other buildings, furniture, and every description of property of the members thereof, against loss or damage by fire.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That the capital stock of this company shall consist of the premium notes given by the insured and of the cash paid in as interest on said premium notes, which cash shall never exceed twenty thousand dollars. Said notes shall be payable on demand, and shall constitute and be a lien to the amount thereof, respectively, upon all buildings insured by said company, and the land upon which they stand, and the appurtenances to such land, and upon the estate and interest, legal or equitable, of the assured in such buildings, lands, and appurtenances, and upon the other property insured by said company in consideration thereof: Provided, That said company shall file in the office of the clerk of the circuit court of the District of Columbia a memorandum of the name of the individual insured, a description of the property, and the amount of the premium note unpaid; and the said note, upon the filing of said memorandum, shall be deemed and taken to be in all respects as a judgment entered upon confession by virtue of a warrant of attorney, and execution may at any time be had thereon for so much as by virtue of the provisions of this act may be due and demeanable; but the lien thereof shall commence with the filing of the memorandum in the said office: Provided, That such lien shall not be construed to take from such person insured as aforesaid the privilege of a freeholder: Provided further, That the privileges, immunities, and franchises granted by this act shall be confined to the District of Columbia.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That all persons who shall hereafter insure with said corporation, and also their heirs, executors, administrators, and assigns, continuing to be insured by said corporation, shall thereby become members thereof during the period they shall remain insured by said corporation, and no longer.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That any member of the said corporation shall have full power to withdraw therefrom at any time by applying to the proper officer thereof, and paying any arrearages of assessments that he may then owe the company, when the said officer shall cancel such insurance or insurances as may be in the name of the person or persons so withdrawing; and also cancel such premium note or notes for which said person is responsible, and return any amount of money which may be due said person on the books of the company; and such person shall be debarred from all claims on this company for any loss or damage by fire subsequent to the time of such withdrawal and the canceling such insurance: Provided, That such premium note or notes shall not be canceled, or in any manner discharged or given up, until all such arrearages are paid, and also all assessments thereupon to be thereafter made on account of liabilities of the company incurred before or at the time of such withdrawal.

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That the affairs of said corporation shall be conducted by a board consisting of seven managers, to be elected at the annual meetings of the members, and to continue in office until successors are chosen; not less than a majority of whom shall be a quorum to do business, but a less number may adjourn from time to time. Vacancies happening in said board may be filled by the remaining managers for the remainder of the year for which they were elected. The board shall choose one of their number as president, and appoint a secretary and treasurer and such other officers as may be necessary for conducting the affairs of said corporation.

SEC. 7. And be it further enacted, That the persons named in this act be, and they are hereby, appointed a board of managers of the said Mutual Insurance Company until the first annual meeting, and until their successors are chosen, as herein provided; and such of them as shall be present at their first meeting may proceed to organize, by electing a president and secretary thereof, and as soon thereafter as practicable, adopt by-laws, provide the necessary books, and otherwise prepare the company for the transaction of business, and, when so prepared, to exercise a general superintendence of the affairs of the company: Provided, That the said by-laws shall only be made by the concurrent vote of at least two thirds of the whole board of managers, exclusive of the president; and any alteration or amendment shall only be made by a general meeting of the members of the company at any annual meeting, and two thirds of the votes shall decide; and any alteration thus made shall be binding on all the members of the company.

SEC. 8. And be it further enacted, That the managers may determine the rates of insurance, the sum to be insured, and the rate of interest to be paid upon the deposit notes, provided it shall not exceed six per centum per annum; but no more than five thousand dollars shall be insured on any one risk, unless the premium notes shall amount to over one hundred thousand dollars, and in that case no risk to exceed five per centum on the whole amount of premium notes.

SEC. 9. And be it further enacted, That every person who shall become a member of said corporation by effecting insurance therein, shall, before he receives a policy, deposit his promissory note for such sum and upon such interest, not exceeding six per centum per annum, as may be determined by the managers; and said note, and all interest paid thereon, shall be liable, in part or the whole, at any time, when the managers shall deem the same requisite for the payment of losses and such incidental expenses as may be necessary for transacting the business of said company, in proportion to the amount of said notes.

SEC. 10. And be it further enacted, That suits may be commenced by any member against this corporation for damages sustained by fire, if payment is withheld for more than sixty days after the company are duly notified of the same; and no member of this corporation, not being in his individual capacity a party to such suit, shall be incompetent as a witness in such suit on account of his being a member of said company.

SEC. 11. And be it further enacted, That whenever the managers shall deem it necessary, for the purpose of paying losses, or the current expenses of said company, or both, to call for the payment of any portion of the principal of the deposit notes, they shall settle and determine the sum to be paid by the several members of said company, which shall always be in proportion to the original amount of the respective deposit notes, and shall give each of said members notice thereof, in such manner as the by-laws shall have prescribed; and if any member shall, for the space of thirty days after receiving such notice, refuse or neglect to pay the sum assessed upon him, in such case the managers may proceed to collect the whole amount of such deposit note, with all costs accruing thereon; and the amount thus collected shall remain in the treasury of the company, subject to the same liabilities as said note or notes would have been liable to.

Sec. 12. And be it further enacted, That the general meetings of this company shall be held annually, the time and place to be determined by the managers; also, it shall be the duty of the president to call a meeting of the company whenever requested to do so by twenty of its members. The election of managers shall be held at the annual meetings, and be by ballot, each member having one vote for each risk held by him. It shall also be the duty of the managers of said corporation to cause to be published annually, in a newspaper published in the city of Washington, the amount of the premium notes and cash on hand, and securities held by them, and the amount of losses, if any, during the previous year, and such other matters relating to the business of said company, as they may think proper; said publication to be at least two weeks previous to the annual meeting of the members of the company; and of said meetings notice shall be given in two newspapers published in the city of Washington, at least two weeks previous thereto.

Sec. 13. And be it further enacted, That nothing in this act shall be construed to grant banking privileges, or the right to issue any note in the nature of a bank note, or to circulate as money or currency. It shall, however, be lawful for said company to employ and improve all moneys received by them, and the profits thereof, in such manner as the managers deem best for the interest of the company, except as above prohibited, and except in the purchase of real estate. And all real estate purchased by said company for the purposes of collecting or securing debts, shall escheat to the Government of the United States, unless the same shall have been sold and disposed of, and passed bona fide from the possession and ownership of said corporation, within three years next succeeding such purchase: Provided, Said company may hold property that may be absolutely necessary for the transaction of their corporate business.

Sec. 14. And be it further enacted, That this act shall be in full force and effect from its passage.

Sec. 15. And be it further enacted, That Congress reserves to itself the right to change, alter, repeal, or annul this act, or any part thereof, at their pleasure.

Sec. 16. And be it further enacted, That the members of said corporation shall each be liable in his or her individual capacity for all debts created by said corporation in favor of persons not members thereof.

Approved, January 10, 1855.

Public, XV.—An Act to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to issue a Register to the Bark Martha.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That there be issued, under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, a register for the bark Martha, of Charleston, in the State of South Carolina, formerly a British vessel, called the Aquatic, but now owned by John W. Caldwell, a citizen of the State of South Carolina, the said vessel having been brought into the port of Charleston in a disabled condition, and condemned as unseaworthy and sold, and which he caused to be repaired and refitted for sea: Provided, It shall be proved to the satisfaction of the Secretary of the Treasury that the cost of the repairs made in the United States, after the purchase of the said vessel by the present owner exceeds three fourths of the original cost of building a vessel of the same tonnage in the United States.

Approved, January 25, 1855.

Public, XXIII.—An Act for the relief of the West Feliciana Railroad and the Georgia Railroad and Banking Companies.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized to refund to the West Feliciana Railroad Company the amount paid by them in judgments obtained against said company by suits instituted on duty bonds given by said company for the importation of certain bars of railroad iron imported at New Orleans in the month of July, eighteen hundred and thirty-six, and at New York in the same month of the same year: Provided, That it shall appear to the satisfaction of the Secretary of the Treasury that the said railroad bars have been and are now permanently laid down upon the railroad of the aforesaid company, except such part thereof as may be proved to the satisfaction of said Secretary to have been lost by the sinking of the steamboat Choctaw in an attempt to transport the same from New Orleans to Bayou Sara.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized to refund to the Georgia Railroad and Banking Company the duties collected on certain railroad iron imported by said company: Provided, That the said company shall prove to the satisfaction of the Secretary of the Treasury that the rails so imported were actually laid down at or about the time when the rails of the Red River Company, the Central Railroad and Banking Company of Georgia, and the Monroe Railroad Company were laid down—on the rails of which companies Congress has already remitted the duties.

APPROVED, February 10, 1855.

PUBLIC, XXIV.—An Act to divide the State of Illinois into two Judicial Districts.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the State of Illinois be, and the same is hereby, divided into two judicial districts, in the manner following, to wit: The counties of Hancock, McDonough, Peoria, Woodford, Livingston, and Iriquois, and all the counties in the said State north of them, shall compose one district, to be called the northern district of Illinois, and courts shall be held for the said district at the city of Chicago; and the residue of the counties of the said State shall compose another district, to be called the southern district of Illinois, and courts shall be held for the same at the city of Springfield.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That there shall be two terms of the circuit and district courts begun and held in each of said districts, to wit: At the city of Chicago, for the northern district, on the first Monday in July and third Monday in December; and at the city of Springfield, for the southern district, on the first Monday in March and the first Monday in October, in each year; and the said courts are hereby authorized to hold adjourned terms when the business shall, in the opinion of the courts, require it.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That all suits, and other proceedings, of whatever name or nature, now pending in the circuit or district courts of the United States for the district of Illinois, shall be tried and disposed of in the circuit and district courts, respectively, for the northern district of Illinois, in the same manner as the same would have been in case said State had not been divided into two districts, and for that purpose the jurisdiction is reserved to the said courts in the northern district; and the clerk of the circuit and district courts for the present district of Illinois shall remove the records and files of the said circuit and district courts to the city of Chicago, and do and perform all duties appertaining to his office within the northern district. And all process or other proceedings, taken or issued, or made returnable to the circuit or district courts of the present district of Illinois, shall be returnable at the next term of the said courts, respectively, in the northern district of Illinois.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That upon application of any party to any suit now pending which would have been commenced in the southern district if this act had been in force before the commencement of the said suit, the proper court may, and if all parties consent, shall order that the same be removed for further proceedings to the proper court for the southern district; and thereupon the clerk shall transmit all the papers in the cause, with a transcript of all orders taken therein to the clerk of the court to which the suit shall be removed, and all further proceedings shall be had in said court as if the said suit had been originally commenced therein.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That the present judge of the district of Illinois be, and is hereby, assigned to the northern district of Illinois.

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That final process on any judgment or decree entered in the circuit or district courts of the United States for the district of Illinois, and all other process for the enforcement of any order of said courts, respectively, in any cause now pending therein, except causes removed, as hereinbefore provided, shall be issued from, and made returnable to, the proper court for the northern district of Illinois, and may be directed to and executed by the marshal of the said northern district in any part of the said State.

SEC. 7. And be it further enacted, That there be appointed a district judge for the [the] said southern district of Illinois, and the district judge of each of the said districts shall be entitled to an annual salary of twenty-five hundred dollars.

SEC. 8. And be it further enacted, That the present district attorney for the district of Illinois shall be the district attorney for the northern district; the present marshal of the district of Illinois shall be the marshal for the northern district; and the present clerk of the courts for the district of Illinois, shall be the clerk of the courts for the northern district during their respective official terms.

SEC. 9. And be it further enacted, That there be appointed a district attorney, a marshal, and a clerk of the court for the southern district.

APPROVED, February 13, 1855.

PUBLIC, XXV.—An Act to continue temporarily the Offices of Register and Receiver at Vincennes.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the offices of register and receiver shall be continued at Vincennes, Indiana, until after a final report shall have been made by the commissioners pursuant to the act of Congress, approved July twenty-seventh, eighteen hundred and fifty-four, entitled "An act to ascertain and adjust the titles to certain lands in the State of Indiana," and the act of Congress approved twelfth June, eighteen hundred and forty, for the discontinuance of land offices under certain circumstances shall not apply to the offices at Vincennes until the services required, by the aforesaid act of twenty-seventh July, eighteen hundred and fifty-four, of the commissioners shall have been fully performed.

APPROVED, February 13, 1855.

PUBLIC, XXVI.—An Act to Refund to the Officers of the Customs and others, of the District of Passamaquoddy, certain Moneys.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and hereby is, authorized and directed, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to pay to the late officers of the customs of the district of Passamaquoddy, and informers, their proportion of the net proceeds of sale, by virtue of existing laws, arising from the condemnation of the schooners L'Etang and Josephine, and the bark Phenix, for a violation of the revenue laws in the district of Maine; the same having been wrongfully paid into the Treasury of the United States through mistake.

APPROVED, February 14, 1855.

PUBLIC, XXVII.—An Act to divide the State of Ohio into two Judicial Districts, and to provide for holding the District and Circuit Courts of the United States therein.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the State of Ohio be, and the same is hereby, divided into two judicial districts, in the following manner, to wit: The counties of Belmont, Guernsey, Muskingum, Licking, Franklin, Madison, Champaign, Shelby, and Mercer, together with all that part of the State lying south of the above mentioned counties, shall compose one district, to be called the southern district of Ohio, and a court shall be held for the said district at the city of Cincinnati, and all the remaining part of the said State shall compose another district, to be called the northern district of Ohio, and a court shall be held for the same in the city of Cleveland, in said State.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That there shall be two terms of the circuit and district courts begun and held in each of said districts, to wit: At the city of Cincinnati, for the southern district, on the third Tuesdays of April and October, and at the city of Cleveland; for the northern district, on the second Tuesdays of July and November, in each year; and the said courts are hereby authorized to hold adjourned terms, when the business before the court shall, in the opinion of the court, require it.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That all suits and other proceedings, of whatever name or nature, now pending in the circuit or district courts of the United States for the district of Ohio, shall be tried and disposed of in the circuit and district courts, respectively, for the southern district of Ohio, in the same manner as the same would have been in case said State had not been divided into two districts; and for that purpose the jurisdiction is reserved to said courts in the southern district, and the clerk of the circuit and district courts, for the present district of Ohio, shall remove the records and files of the said circuit and district courts to the city of Cincinnati, and do and perform all the duties appertaining to his office within the southern district, and all process and other proceedings taken or issued, or made returnable to the circuit or district court for the present district of Ohio, shall be returnable at the next term of the said courts, respectively, in the southern district of Ohio.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That upon the application of any party to any suit now pending, which would have been commenced in the northern district, if this act had been in force before the commencement of said suit, the proper court may, and, if all parties consent, shall order that the same be removed for further proceedings to the proper court for the northern district; and therefore the clerk shall transmit all the papers in the cause, with a transcript of the order of the removal, to the clerk of the court to which the suit shall be removed, and all further proceedings shall be had in said court as if the suit had been originally commenced therein.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That the present judge of the district of Ohio be, and he is hereby, assigned to hold said courts in the southern district of Ohio, and shall exercise the same jurisdiction and perform the same duties, within said district, as he now exercises and performs within his present district.

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That final process upon any judgment or decree entered in the circuit or district court of the United States for the district of Ohio, and all other process for the enforcement of any order of said courts, respectively, in any cause now pending therein, except causes removed as hereinbefore provided, shall be issued from, and made returnable to, the proper court for the southern district of Ohio, and may run and be executed by the marshal of said southern district in any part of said State.

SEC. 7. And be it further enacted, That there be appointed a district judge for the said northern district of Ohio, who shall possess the same powers, and do and perform all such duties in his district as are now enjoined or in anywise appertaining to the present district judge for the district of Ohio, and the district judge of each district shall be entitled to the same compensation as by law is provided for the present judge for the district of Ohio.

SEC. 8. And be it further enacted, That there be appointed one person as district attorney, and one person as marshal, for said southern district, whose terms of appointment and service, as well as duties and emoluments, shall be the same with those respectively appertaining to the said offices in the district of Ohio; and said marshal shall give the same bond that other marshals are required to give, to be approved and recorded as now directed by law: Provided, That the present district attorney of the district of Ohio shall be the district attorney of the northern district, but shall retain the charge of all suits already commenced until final termination, unless the President of the United States shall otherwise direct, and the present marshal of the district of Ohio shall be the marshal of the northern district, during their respective official terms.

SEC. 9. And be it further enacted, That all suits hereafter to be brought in either of said courts, not of a local nature, shall be brought in the court of the district where the defendant resides; but if there be more than one defendant, and they reside in different districts, the plaintiff may sue in either and send a duplicate writ against the defendants, directed to the marshal of the other district, on which an indorsement shall be made that the writ thus sent is a copy of a writ sued out of the court of the proper district; and the said writs, when executed and returned into the office from whence they issued, shall constitute one suit, and be proceeded in accordingly.

APPROVED, February 10, 1855.

Funch and Andrew F. Meinche, of the State and city of New York, her present owners.

APPROVED, February 21, 1855.

PUBLIC, XL.—An Act to establish the Office of Surveyor General of Utah, and to grant Land for School and University purposes.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, shall be, and he is hereby, authorized to appoint a surveyor general for Utah, whose annual salary shall be three thousand dollars, and whose power, authority, and duties shall be the same as those provided by law for the surveyor general of Oregon, prior to the act of July seventeen, eighteen hundred and fifty-four; and he shall locate his office from time to time at such places as may be directed by the President of the United States.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That when the lands in said Territory shall be surveyed under the direction of the Government of the United States, preparatory to bringing the same into market, sections numbered sixteen and thirty-six in each township in said Territory shall be, and the same are hereby, reserved for the purpose of being applied to schools in said Territory, and in the States and Territories hereafter to be created out of the same.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That when the lands in said Territory shall be surveyed, as aforesaid, a quantity of land equal to two townships shall be, and the same is hereby, reserved for the establishment of a university in said Territory, and in the State hereafter to be created out of the same, to be selected under the direction of the Legislature, in legal subdivisions of not less than one half section, and to be disposed of as said Legislature may direct.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That full power and authority are hereby given to the Secretary of the Interior to issue all needful rules and regulations for fully carrying into effect the several provisions of this act.

APPROVED, February 21, 1855.

PUBLIC, XLI.—An Act to provide for holding an additional Term of the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Missouri, and for holding Special Terms of the District and Circuit Courts of the United States for the Northern District of Ohio.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That it shall be the duty of the district judge of the United States for the district of Missouri to hold, at the city of St. Louis, on the first Monday in October in every year, a term of the circuit court of the United States for said district, at which term any business may be transacted which might be transacted at the April term of said court.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the United States circuit court for said district shall have power, at any time, to order an adjourned term of said court to be held at any other time, at which adjourned term any business may be transacted which could be transacted at any regular term. A copy of said order shall be posted on the door of the court room, and advertised in some newspaper printed in the city of St. Louis twenty days, at least, before said adjourned term shall be holden.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That the district judge for said district may order a special term or terms of said circuit court, to be holden at St. Louis on any day mentioned in said order, at which special term any business may be transacted which might be transacted at any regular term of said court, and shall cause the copy of said order to be posted up and published as aforesaid. He may also rescind any such order, made either in term time or vacation, or fix a different day for said term or terms, giving notice thereof as aforesaid.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That there shall be held at the city of Cleveland, in the State of Ohio, on the third Tuesday in March, this year, a special term of the district court of the United States for the northern district of Ohio, and also a special term of the circuit court of the United States for said district, at which terms respectively any business may be transacted which might, under existing laws, be transacted at any regular term.

APPROVED, February 21, 1855.

PUBLIC, XLII.—An Act to establish a Court for the Investigation of Claims against the United States.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That a court shall be established, to be called a court of claims, to consist of three judges, to be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and to hold their offices during good behavior; and the said court shall hear and determine all claims founded upon any law of Congress, or upon any regulation of an executive department, or upon any contract, express or implied, with the Government of the United States, which may be suggested to it by a petition filed therein; and also all claims which may be referred to said court by either House of Congress. It shall be the duty of the claimant in all cases to set forth a full statement of the claim, and of the action thereon in Congress, or by any of the Departments, if such action has been had; specifying, also, what person or persons are owners thereof or interested therein, and when and upon what consideration such person or persons became so interested. Each of the said judges shall receive a compensation of four thousand dollars per annum, payable quarterly, from the Treasury of the United States, and shall take an oath to support the Constitution of the United States, and discharge faithfully the duties of his office.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That a solicitor for the United States, to represent the Government before said court, shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. It shall be the duty of the said solicitor to prepare all cases on the part of the Government for hearing before said court, and to argue the same when prepared; to cause testimony to be taken, when necessary to secure the interest of the United States; to prepare forms, file interrogatories, and superintend the taking of testimony in the manner prescribed by said court, and generally to render such services as may be required of him, from time to time, in the discharge of the duties of his office. Said solicitor shall be sworn to faithful discharge of the duties of his office, in the manner prescribed for the qualification of the judges in the first section of this act; and he shall receive a compensation of three thousand five hundred dollars per annum for his services, to be paid quarterly from the Treasury of the United States.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That the said court shall have authority to establish rules and regulations for its government; to appoint commissioners to take testimony to be used in the investigation of claims that may come before it; to prescribe the fees they shall receive for their services; and to issue commissions for the taking of such testimony, whether the same shall be taken at the instance of the claimant or of the United States, and also to issue subpenas to require the attendance of witnesses in order to be examined before such commissioners; which subpenas shall have the same force as if issued from a district court of the United States, and compliance therewith shall be compelled under such rules and orders as the court hereby created shall establish. When testimony is taken for the claimant, the fees of the commissioner before whom it is taken, and the cost of the commission and notice, shall be paid by such claimant; and when taken at the instance of the Government, such fees, together with all postage incurred by the solicitor aforesaid, in his official capacity, shall be paid out of the contingent fund provided for said court. In all cases, when it can be conveniently done, the testimony shall be taken in the county where the deponent resides; and the commissioner taking the same is hereby authorized and required to administer an oath or affirmation to the witnesses brought before him for examination.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That in all cases where it shall appear to the court that the facts set forth in the petition of the claimant do not furnish any ground for relief, it shall not be the duty of the court to authorize the taking of any testimony in the case until the same shall have been reported by them to Congress, as is hereinafter provided: Provided, however, That if Congress shall, in such case, fail to confirm the opinion of said board, they shall proceed to take the testimony in such case.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That in taking testimony to be used in support of any claim before said court, opportunity shall be given to the United States to file interrogatories, or by attorney to examine witnesses, under such regulations as said court shall prescribe, and like opportunity shall be afforded the claimant, in cases where testimony is taken on behalf of the United States, under like regulations.

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That if any person shall knowingly and willfully swear falsely before said court, or before any person or persons commissioned by them, or authorized by this act to take testimony in a case pending before said court at the time of taking said oath, or in a case thereafter to be submitted to said court, such person shall be deemed guilty of perjury, and, on conviction thereof, shall be subjected to the same pains, penalties, and disabilities which now are, or shall be hereafter, by law prescribed for willful and corrupt perjury.

SEC. 7. And be it further enacted, That said court shall keep a record of their proceedings, and shall, at the commencement of each session of Congress, and at the commencement of each month during the session of Congress, report to Congress the cases upon which they shall have finally acted, stating in each the material facts which they find established by the evidence, with their opinion in the case, and the reasons upon which such opinion is founded. Any judge who may dissent from the opinion of the majority shall append his reasons for such dissent to the report; and such report, together with the briefs of the solicitor and of the claimant, which shall accompany the report, upon being made to either House of Congress, shall be printed in the same manner as other public documents. And said court shall prepare a bill or bills in those cases which shall have received the favorable decision thereof, in such form as, if enacted, will carry the same into effect. And two or more cases may be embraced in the same bill, where the separate amount proposed to be allowed in each case shall be less than one thousand dollars. And the said court shall transmit with said reports the testimony in each case, whether the same shall receive the favorable or adverse action of said court.

SEC. 8. And be it further enacted, That said reports, and the bills reported as aforesaid, shall, if not finally acted upon during the session of Congress to which the said reports are made, be continued from session to session, and from Congress to Congress, until the same shall be finally acted upon, and the consideration of said reports and bills shall, at the subsequent session of Congress, be resumed, and the said reports and bills be proceeded with in the same manner as though finally acted upon at the session when presented.

SEC. 9. And be it further enacted, That the claims reported upon adversely shall be placed upon the Calendar when reported, and if the decision of said court shall be confirmed by Congress, said decision shall be conclusive; and the said court shall not, at any subsequent period, consider said claims unless such reasons shall be presented to said court as, by the rules of common law or chancery in suits between individuals, would furnish sufficient ground for granting a new trial.

SEC. 10. And be it further enacted, That it shall be the duty of the Speaker of the House of Representatives, within a reasonable time after the passage of this act, to appropriate such rooms in the Capitol at Washington, for the use of said court, as may be necessary for their accommodation, unless it shall appear to the Speaker that such rooms cannot be appropriated without interfering with the business of Congress; and in that event the said court shall procure, at the city of Washington, such rooms as may be necessary for the convenient transaction of their business.

SEC. 11. And be it further enacted, That said court shall have power to call upon any of the Departments for any information or papers it may deem necessary, and have the use of all recorded and printed reports made by the committees of each House, when deemed to be necessary in the prosecution of the duties assigned by this act. Said court shall appoint a clerk, whose salary shall be two thousand dollars per annum, and an assistant clerk, if deemed necessary, whose salary shall be fifteen hundred dollars, and a messenger, whose salary shall be eight hundred dollars per annum, to be paid quarterly at the Treasury. The said clerks shall be under the direction of said court in the performance of their duties, and for misconduct or incapacity may be removed from office by it; but, when so removed, said board shall make report thereof, with the cause of such removal, to Congress, if in session, or at the next session of Congress. Said clerk and assistant clerk shall take an oath for the faithful discharge of their duties: Provided, That the head of no Department shall answer any call for information or papers if, in his opinion, it would be injurious to the puolic interest.

APPROVED, February 24, 1855.

PUBLIC, XLIII.—An Act concerning the Apprehension and Delivery of Deserters from Foreign Vessels in the Ports of the United States.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the commissioners who now are, or hereafter may be, appointed by the circuit courts of the United States to take acknowledgments of bail, and for other purposes, may and shall exercise all the powers conferred on any court, judge, or other magistrate, by the act approved the second day of March, one thousand eight hundred and twenty-nine, entitled "An act to provide for the apprehension and delivery of deserters from certain foreign vessels in the ports of the United States."

APPROVED, February 24, 1855.

PUBLIC, XLIV.—An Act to establish an additional Land District in the State of Wisconsin.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That all that part of the present Willow river land district, in the State of Wisconsin, lying north of the line dividing townships forty and forty-one, (or fourth correction line,) be, and the same is hereby, created a land district, to be called the Fond du Lac District; the office for which shall be located at such place therein as the President may, from time to time, direct.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That there shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, a register and a receiver for said district, who shall, respectively, be required to reside at the site of the office, be subject to the same laws, and entitled to the same compensation as is, or may hereafter be, prescribed by law in relation to other land offices of the United States.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That the sales shall continue at the Willow river district till the land officers for that district are notified that the officers for the district created by this act are prepared to enter on their duties; and in all cases hereafter, the salaries of land officers shall commence only from the time they enter on the discharge of their duties.

APPROVED, February 24, 1855.

PUBLIC, XLV.—An Act to provide for holding the United States Courts in the Northern and Southern Districts of Florida in case of the sickness or disability of either of the Judges of those Districts.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That all the provisions of the act of Congress approved the twenty-ninth of July, eighteen hundred and fifty, entitled "An act to provide for holding the courts of the United States in case of the sickness or other disability of the judges of the district courts," shall be, and are hereby declared to be, applicable to the two judicial districts of the State of Florida and the judges thereof, so far forth as the same can be applied to the said districts and judges; and that the designation and appointment of either of the said judges to hold the courts in the district of the other, in consequence of the sickness or disability of such other judge, may be made either by the Chief Justice of the United States or by the circuit judge of an adjoining circuit on such certificate as is required by the act aforesaid: Provided, however, That a written certificate of the judge of either of said districts, certifying that he is unable, from sickness or physical inability, to hold any regular term, or adjourned or extra term, of the courts appointed to be holden in his district, and requesting the judge of the other district to hold the same, shall, when filed in the clerk's office of the place where such term of the court is to be holden, be sufficient to authorize the said judge of the other district to hold said courts, and shall confer upon him all the powers and privileges granted by the aforesaid act to judges designated and appointed by a circuit judge or the Chief Justice of the United States in pursuance of the provisions of said act.

APPROVED, February 24, 1855.

PUBLIC, XLVI.—An Act making Appropriations for the payment of Invalid and other Pensions of the United States for the year ending the thirtieth of June, one thousand eight hundred and fifty-six, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the following sums be, and the same are hereby, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the payment of pensions for the year ending the thirtieth of June, one thousand eight hundred and fifty-six:

For invalid pensions, under various acts, five hundred and fourteen thousand six hundred dollars.

For pensions to widows and orphans, under acts of the fourth of July, one thousand eight hundred and thirty-six, and twenty-first of July, one thousand eight hundred and forty-eight, seventy-eight thousand one hundred and fifty dollars.

For pensions under special acts of Congress, nine thousand seven hundred and fifty dollars.

For pensions to widows, under acts of the seventeenth of June, one thousand eight hundred and forty-four, second of February and twenty-ninth July, one thousand eight hundred and forty-eight, three hundred and thirty-eight thousand dollars.

For pensions and half-pay to widows and orphans, under act of the third of February, one thousand eight hundred and fifty-three, four hundred and fifty-six thousand dollars.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That any moneys appropriated by the act of thirty-first May, eighteen hundred and fifty-four, to supply deficiencies for the fiscal year ending the thirtieth of June, eighteen hundred and fifty-four, applicable to the payment of pensions of invalids who were wounded on board of private-armed vessels during the last war with Great Britain, not required under the provisions thereof, may be applied to the same purpose for the year ending the thirtieth of June, eighteen hundred and fifty-five.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That the widows of the officers, non-commissioned officers, marines, or mariners, who served in the Navy of the United States during the revolutionary war, and who were married since the first day of January, eighteen hundred, shall be entitled to pensions in the same manner and to the same extent as the widows of the officers and soldiers of the army of the Revolution, under the second section of the act of February third, eighteen hundred and fifty-three.

APPROVED, February 28, 1855.

PUBLIC, XLVII.—An Act to promote the Efficiency of the Navy.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That as soon as practicable after the passage of this act, the President of the United States shall cause a board of naval officers to be assembled, to consist of five captains, five commanders, and five lieutenants, which board, under such regulations as the Secretary of the Navy may prescribe, shall make a careful examination into the efficiency of the officers of the grades hereinafter mentioned, and shall report to the Secretary of the Navy the names and rank of all officers of the said grades who, in the judgment of said board, shall be incapable of performing promptly and efficiently all their duty both ashore and afloat, and whenever said board shall believe that said incompetency has arisen from any cause implying sufficient blame on the part of the officer to justify it, they shall recommend that his name be stricken altogether from the rolls. Vacancies occurring in said board shall be filled by the Secretary of the Navy, who shall preserve the number and grades of its officers, as aforesaid: Provided, That no officers upon said board shall examine into, or report upon, the efficiency of officers of a grade above them.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That all officers who shall be found by the said board incapable of performing the duties of their respective offices, ranks, or grades, shall, if such finding be approved by the President, be dropped from the rolls, or placed, in the order of their rank and seniority at the time, upon a list in the Navy Register, to be entitled the "reserved list," and those so placed on the reserved list shall receive the leave-of-absence pay or the furlough pay to which they may be entitled when so placed, according to the report of the board and approval of the President, and shall be ineligible to further promotion, but shall be subject to the orders of the Navy Department at all times for duty; and vacancies created in the active-service list by placing officers on the reserved list, shall be filled by regular promotion in the order of rank or seniority. And officers who may be promoted to fill the vacancies created by the reserved list shall, while unemployed, receive only the "leave-of-absence" or "waiting-orders" pay to which they would have been entitled if such promotion had not been made; but when employed at sea, or on other duty, they shall receive, in addition to such "leave-of-absence" or "waiting-orders" pay, the difference between the "waiting-orders" or "leave-of-absence" pay and the lowest sea-service pay of the grade to which they may be so promoted: Provided, That this scrutiny and reservation of officers shall extend only to the grades of captain, commander, lieutenant, masters, and passed midshipmen: And provided further, That all vacancies occurring in the grade of masters shall be filled by the promotion of the senior passed midshipmen, to be entitled masters in the line of promotion, who when promoted shall receive the pay allowed by law to masters; that the number of masters in the line of promotion shall not exceed sixty, and that nothing in this act contained shall be held or construed to authorize any increase of the aggregate pay of the said grades, or of the naval service, as now allowed by law.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That nothing in this act contained shall be construed to restrict, apply to, or impair the regular promotion of officers in the service list of the Navy who may be at any time entitled to promotion, consequent upon deaths, dismissals, or resignations, in the naval service, nor in any manner to abridge or impair the right of the Secretary of the Navy to place any officers upon furlough.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That nothing in this act shall be so construed as to increase the aggregate number of officers, and that all laws, or clauses of laws, so far as they conflict with the provisions of this act, are hereby repealed.

APPROVED, February 28, 1855.

PUBLIC, XLVIII.—An Act making an Appropriation for Military Defenses at Proctor's Landing, in Louisiana.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the sum of one hundred and twenty-five thousand dollars be, and the same is hereby, appropriated out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of War, in the purchase of a site, and the erection and completion of such military defenses, as may be deemed expedient, at Proctor's Landing, at the terminus of the Mexican Gulf railway, in the State of Louisiana.

APPROVED, February 28, 1855.

PUBLIC, XLIX.—An Act to provide for the Payment of such Creditors of the late Republic of Texas as are comprehended in the act of Congress of September nine, eighteen hundred and fifty.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That in lieu of the sum of five millions of dollars, payable to the State of Texas in five per cent. stock of the United States, by the act entitled "An act proposing to the State of Texas the establishment of her northern and western boundaries, the relinquishment by the said State of all territory claimed by her exterior to said boundaries, and of all her claims upon the United States, and to establish a territorial government for New Mexico," passed September ninth, eighteen hundred and fifty, the issuing of which stock was restricted by the first proviso to the fifth proposition contained in the first section of said act, the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to the creditors of the late Republic of Texas, who hold such bonds, or other evidences of debt for which the revenues of that Republic were pledged, as were reported to be within the provisions of the said act of September the ninth, eighteen hundred and fifty, by the report of the late Secretary of the Treasury to the President of the United States, and approved by him on the thirteenth day of September, eighteen hundred and fifty-one, or which come within the provisions of said act, according to the opinion upon the Texas compact of the present Attorney General of the United States, addressed to the Secretary of the Treasury, under date of September twenty-sixth, eighteen hundred and fifty-three, the sum of seven millions seven hundred and fifty thousand dollars, to be apportioned among the said holders pro rata: Provided, That the interest on the debt embraced in this act shall be determined by the existing laws of the State of Texas.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That in all cases where the State of Texas may have paid any portion of the debt described in this act, the said Secretary shall refund to the proper officer of said State the amount actually so paid by the State upon the presentation at the Treasury Department of the evidences of said debt, on which the said State may have made such payment: Provided, The said sum shall not exceed the proportion which would have been allowed to the creditor or creditors, if such payment on said evidences of debt had not been made by the State of Texas; and where the said sum that may be refunded to the State of Texas by the provisions of this section is less than the proportion which would have been allowed under this act to the holders of such evidences of debt, had such payment not been made them, such holders shall be entitled to receive the difference between said sum and the proportion they would have received under this act if no payment had been made them; and where any original certificates or other evidences of debt have been surrendered to the authority of the State of Texas, and new certificates issued therefor by said State of Texas, such new certificate shall be received as evidences of the original amount of the claim.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That no payment shall be made under this act to any holder of said securities, or evidences of debt, unless the said holder shall first execute to the United States a receipt for the said payment, in which said holder shall forever release all claim against the United States for or on account of the said securities, or evidences of debt; also similar releases, to said State of Texas, and the said certificates, or other evidences of debt, shall then be deposited with the Treasury Department.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That before payment of the moneys aforesaid, the Secretary of the Treasury shall give notice, by public advertisement, for the space of ninety days, of the time at which said payment will be made; and no payment shall be made on any bond, certificate, or evidence of debt, which shall not, thirty days before the time limited by said notice, be presented at the Treasury Department.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That the sum of seven millions seven hundred and fifty thousand dollars be, and the same is hereby, appropriated out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the purpose of carrying into effect the provisions of this act.

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That this act shall not take effect until it shall be assented to by an act of the Legislature of the State of Texas, and a copy of the act of said State duly authenticated, deposited in the Treasury Department at Washington, nor until the Legislature of the State of Texas shall pass an act withdrawing and abandoning all claims and demands against the United States, growing out of Indian depredations or otherwise.

APPROVED, February 28, 1855.

PUBLIC, L.—An Act to confirm the Canal Selections in the State of Ohio.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the selections of land by the State of Ohio for canal purposes under the act of second March, eighteen hundred and twenty-seven, and twenty-fourth May, eighteen hundred and twenty-eight, be, and the same are hereby, confirmed.

APPROVED, March 2, 1855.

PUBLIC, LI.—An Act extending in certain cases the provisions of the act entitled "An act to extend Preëmption Rights to certain Land therein mentioned," approved March third, eighteen hundred and fifty-three.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the right of preëmption granted by the act of third March, eighteen hundred and fifty-three, entitled "An act to extend preëmption rights to certain lands therein mentioned," shall be, and the same is hereby, extended so that the settler, or occupant on the Maison Rouge grant and the De Bastrop grant, entitled to the benefits of said act, shall be entitled to enter, at the minimum price, every quarter-quarter subdivision, on which he has made improvements: Provided, however, That where any part of the improvements of two or more settlers or occupants is on the same quarter-quarter section, the same shall be entered in their joint names, and their rights shall be proportionate to the extent and value of their improvements thereon.

APPROVED, March 2, 1855.

PUBLIC, LII.—An Act to amend the act approved twenty-sixth August, eighteen hundred and fifty-two, entitled "An act to reduce and define the Boundaries of the Military Reserve at Saint Peter's River, in the Territory of Minnesota," and for other purposes.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the act approved twenty-sixth August, eighteen hundred and fifty-two, "to reduce and define the boundaries of the military reserve at Saint Peter's river, in the Territory of Minnesota," shall be, and the same is hereby, amended, so that the lands authorized to be sold at public sale by that act shall be subject to the operations of the laws regulating the sale and disposition of the public lands: Provided, however, That where any of said lands are claimed by preemption, under settlement and cultivation made prior to the passage of this act, proof and payment shall be made within three months after its passage; and where any of said lands come within the provisions of the act of twenty-third May, eighteen hundred and forty-four, for the relief of the citizens of towns upon the lands of the United States, under certain circumstances, such proof and payment shall also be made within three months after the passage of this act; and in either case, if the entries are not made within that time, the claim shall be forfeited: Provided further, That where two or more persons are settled upon the same legal subdivision, they shall be permitted to enter it jointly—the right of each to be in proportion to the extent of his improvements.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the Rev. E. G. Gear shall be, and he is hereby, authorized to enter lots numbers one and two and the west half of the northeast quarter of section four, in township twenty-eight north, of range twenty-four west, of the fourth principal meridian, in the Minneapolis district, at one dollar and twenty-five cents per acre.

APPROVED, March 2, 1855.

PUBLIC, LIII.—An Act to provide a more Efficient Discipline for the Navy.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That from and after the passage of this act, it shall be the duty of every commanding officer of any of the vessels of the Navy, on returning from a cruise, to forward, immediately on his arrival in port, to the Secretary of the Navy, a list of the names of such of the crew who enlisted for three years as in his opinion, on being discharged, are entitled to an "honorable discharge," as a testimonial of fidelity and obedience; and that he shall grant the same to such, according to the form to be prescribed by the Secretary of the Navy.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That if any seaman, ordinary seaman, landsman, or boy, shall reënlist for three years, within three months after his discharge, he shall, on presenting his honorable discharge, or on accounting in a satisfactory manner for its loss, be entitled to pay during the said three months, equal to that which he would have been entitled if he had been employed in actual service.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That it shall be the duty of commanders of any vessel in the Navy, in granting temporary leave of absence and liberty on shore, to exercise carefully a discrimination in favor of the faithful and obedient.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That summary courts-martial may be ordered upon petty officers and persons of inferior ratings by the commander of any vessel in the Navy to which such persons belong, for the trial of offenses which he may deem deserving of greater punishment than the commander of a vessel himself is by law authorized to inflict of his own authority, but not sufficient to require trial by general court-martial.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That summary courts-martial shall consist of three officers not below the rank of passed midshipmen, and of some competent person to act as recorder. Before proceeding to trial the members shall take the following oath or affirmation, which the recorder is hereby authorized to administer: "You, A B, do solemnly swear (or affirm) that you will well and truly try, without prejudice or partiality, the case now depending, according to the evidence which shall be adduced, the laws for the government of the Navy, and your own conscience. So help you God."

After which, the recorder of the court shall take the following oath or affirmation, which the senior member of the court shall administer: "You, A B, do solemnly swear (or affirm) that you will keep a true record of the evidence which may be given before this court, and of the proceedings thereof. So help you God."

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That the commander of a ship shall have authority to order any officer under his command to act as the recorder of a summary court-martial.

SEC. 7. And be it further enacted, That all testimony given before such court shall be given orally, on oath or affirmation, which the senior member of the court shall administer.

That summary courts-martial may sentence petty officers and persons of inferior ratings to any one of the following punishments, viz:

First. Discharge from the service with bad-conduct discharge, but the sentence not to be carried into effect in a foreign country.

Second. Solitary confinement in irons, single or double, on bread and water, or diminished rations, provided no such confinement shall exceed thirty days.

Third. Solitary confinement in irons, single or double, not exceeding thirty days.

Fourth. Solitary confinement not exceeding thirty days.

Fifth. Confinement not exceeding two months.

Sixth. Reduction to next inferior rating.

Seventh. Deprivation of liberty on shore on foreign station.

Eighth. Extra police duties, and loss of pay, not to exceed three months, may be added to any of the above-mentioned punishments.

SEC. 8. And be it further enacted, That no sentence of a summary court-martial shall be carried into effect without the approval of the officer ordering the court, who shall have power to remit in part or altogether, but not to commute, any such sentence. And it shall be the duty of any such commanding officer to remit any part or the whole of any sentence by a summary court-martial, the execution of which would, in the opinion of the surgeon or senior medical officer on board, given in writing, produce serious injury to the health of the person sentenced; or in case he shall refuse to do so, it shall be his duty, without delay, to submit the case again to the same or to another summary court-martial, which shall have power, upon the testimony already taken, to remit the former punishment, and to assign some other of the authorized punishments in the place thereof.

SEC. 9. And be it further enacted, That the proceedings of summary courts-martial shall be conducted with as much conciseness and precision as may be consistent with the ends of justice, and under such forms and rules as may be prescribed by the Secretary of the Navy, with the approval of the President of the United States; and all such proceedings shall be transmitted in the usual mode to the Navy Department.

SEC. 10. And be it further enacted, That any punishments authorized by this act to be inflicted by a summary court-martial may likewise be inflicted by any general court-martial.

SEC. 11. And be it further enacted, That any person who shall entice any seaman, ordinary seaman, landsman, or boy, who may have enlisted into the naval service of the United States, to desert therefrom, or who shall conceal any person who may have so deserted, and shall refuse to deliver him up upon the order of his commanding officer, shall, upon legal conviction thereof, be fined at the discretion of the court, in any sum not exceeding three hundred dollars, or be imprisoned for any term not exceeding one year.

APPROVED, March 2, 1855.

PUBLIC, LIV.—An Act to amend "An act to establish a Land District in the State of Florida, to be called the District of Tampa."

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the President be, and he is hereby, authorized to appoint, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, a register and a receiver for the land district called Tampa, in the State of Florida, which district was created by the act approved August fifth, eighteen hundred and fifty-four, whose compensation, duties, responsibilities, and emoluments, shall be the same as is or may be prescribed by law for other land officers in said State.

APPROVED, March 2, 1855.

PUBLIC, LV.—An Act to establish the Collection Districts of Cape Perpetua and Port Orford, in the Territory of Oregon, and to fix the Salaries of the Officers of the Customs therein.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That there be, and hereby is, constituted and established the collection districts of Cape Perpetua and Port Orford, in the Territory of Oregon. That the first named district shall embrace the coast of the Pacific ocean from Kowes bay, exclusive to Cape Perpetua, and all of the said Territory lying south of a line running parallel with the southern boundary line of Oregon, from Cape Perpetua to the eastern boundary of Oregon, except so much as is included in the district of Port Orford, and to include all the islands, bays, harbors, inlets, shores, rivers, and waters within said boundaries, and that Gardner (Umpqua) shall be the port of entry for said district. That the last named district shall extend from the line dividing said Territory and the State of California, along the Pacific coast, so far as to include Kowes bay; thence east to the one hundred and twenty-third degree of longitude; thence south along said line to the line dividing the State of California and Oregon Territory; thence by said line to the place of beginning; and to include all the islands, bays, harbors, inlets, rivers, shores, and waters embraced in said boundaries, and that Port Orford shall be the port of entry, and Kowes bay the port of delivery for said district.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That for each of the collection districts of Cape Perpetua and Port Orford, in the Territory of Oregon, the President shall, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, appoint a collector who shall perform the duties of collector and surveyor of the port, and who shall each reside at the port of entry of their respective districts, and receive an annual salary of two thousand dollars each. The Secretary of the Treasury shall have authority to appoint, on the nomination of said collectors, deputy collectors for each of the above named districts equal to the number of the ports of delivery in said districts, or at as many of said ports of delivery as he shall deem expedient, and to fix the compensation of said deputies, not to exceed the sum of one thousand dollars per annum. He may also, if he shall deem it expedient, appoint one clerk for each of said collectors, to keep the accounts of the office and act as auditor in the settlement thereof, at an annual compensation, not exceeding fifteen hundred dollars. He shall also, on the nomination of the said collectors, appoint for said districts, if in his judgment they are necessary, a competent number of weighers, gaugers, and measurers, at a compensation not exceeding six dollars per day each; and such number of inspectors as he shall deem expedient, at a compensation not exceeding four dollars per day each.

APPROVED, March 2, 1855.

PUBLIC, LVI.—An Act to settle certain Accounts between the United States and the State of Alabama.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Commissioner of the General Land Office be, and he is hereby, required to state an account between the United States and the State of Alabama, for the purpose of ascertaining what sum or sums of money are due to said State, heretofore unsettled, under the sixth section of the act of March second, eighteen hundred and nineteen, for the admission of Alabama into the Union; and that he be required to include in said account the several reservations under the various treaties with the Chickasaw, Choctaw, and Creek Indians within the limits of Alabama, and allow and pay to the said State five per centum thereon, as in case of other sales.

APPROVED, March 2, 1855.

PUBLIC, LVII.—An Act to prevent Mistrials in the District and Circuit Courts of the United States in certain cases.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the trial or hearing of any cause, civil or criminal, in any circuit or district court in the United States, which has been commenced and is in progress before a jury or the court, shall not be stayed or discontinued by the arrival of the period fixed by law for another session of said court, and it shall be lawful for the court to proceed with such trial or hearing, and bring it to a conclusion, in like manner and with the same effect as if another stated term of the court had not intervened.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That where letters rogatory shall have be addressed from any court of a foreign country to any circuit court of the United States, and a United States commissioner, designated by said circuit court to make the examination of witnesses in said letters mentioned, said commissioner shall be empowered to compel the witnesses to appear and depose in the same manner as to appear and testify in court.

APPROVED, March 2, 1855.

PUBLIC, LVIII.—An Act authorizing the Purchase or Construction of four additional Revenue Cutters, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the sum of sixty thousand dollars be, and the same is hereby, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to enable the Secretary of the Treasury to cause to be built or purchased, in such mode as he may deem best for the public interest, four vessels of suitable size and construction, to be employed as revenue cutters on such stations as the said Secretary may designate.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That from and after the passage of this act no person shall be appointed to the office of captain, first, second, or third lieutenant, of any revenue cutter, who does not adduce competent proof of proficiency and skill in navigation and seamanship.

APPROVED, March 2, 1855.

PUBLIC, LIX.—An Act to establish a Circuit Court of the United States in and for the State of California.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That a judicial circuit shall be, and the same is hereby, constituted, in and for the State of California, to be known as the circuit court of the United States for the districts of California, a term of which court shall be held annually, in the city of San Francisco, on the first Monday of July in each and every year; and for this purpose a judge shall be appointed, and the court hereby organized shall, in all things, have and exercise the same original jurisdiction as is vested in the several circuit courts of the United States, as organized under existing laws, and shall also have and exercise the same appellate jurisdiction over the district courts of the United States for the northern and southern districts of California as by existing laws is vested in the several circuit courts of the United States over the district courts of the United States in their respective circuits; and the said judge shall appoint a clerk, who shall have the power to appoint a deputy, which clerk shall reside, and keep the records of the court, in the said city of San Francisco, and shall receive for the services he may perform double the fees allowed to the clerk of the southern district of New York.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That said judge shall have power to order and hold such special or extra terms of said court as he may deem expedient, and at such time or times as he shall, by his order, under his hand and seal, direct, addressed to the marshal and clerk of said court, at least thirty days previous to the commencement of such special or extra term or terms, which order shall be published intermediately in two or more of the gazettes of the State of California; and at any or all of such special terms the business of said court shall have reference to the immediately preceding regular or special term, and be proceeded with in the same manner; and such proceedings shall be, to all intents and purposes, as valid as if the same had taken place at a regular term of said court; all which terms shall be held at such place, in the said city of San Francisco, as the marshal of the United States for the northern district of California, whose duty it shall be to act as the marshal of said court, shall procure for the purpose, under the directions of said judge; and appeals from the proceedings of the court organized under this act shall be taken to the Supreme Court of the United States in the same manner, and on the same conditions, as appeals are taken under existing laws from the other circuit courts of the United States.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That the judge of said court shall have the same power to issue writs of habeas corpus and other writs as is vested by law in the other judges of the United States.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That in case the judge of said court shall fail to attend at the time and place of holding any regular or special term of said court before the close of the fourth day after the commencement of such term, the business pending before said court shall stand adjourned until the next regular term of said court, or until the next special term of the court, should one be ordered under the authority of this act previous to such regular term.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That the district courts of the United States for the northern and southern districts of California shall hereafter exercise only the ordinary duties and powers of the district courts of the United States, except the special jurisdiction vested in the said district courts of California over the decisions of the board of commissioners for the settlement of private land claims in California under existing laws; and that appeals from the judgments, orders, and decrees of either of said district courts of California, in the exercise of its ordinary jurisdiction, shall be taken to the circuit court organized by this act in the same manner and upon the same conditions as appeals may be taken from the judgments, orders, or decrees of the district courts to the circuit courts of the United States.

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That the judge appointed under this act shall, from time to time, or at any time when, in his opinion, the business of his own court will permit, and that of the courts of the northern and southern districts of California shall require, form part of, and preside over, the said district courts when either of them is engaged in the discharge of the appellate jurisdiction vested in it over the decisions of the board of commissioners for the settlement of private land claims in the State of California, under the act of Congress entitled "An act to ascertain and settle the private land claims in the State of California," passed March third, eighteen hundred and fifty-one, and by another act entitled "An act making appropriations for the civil and diplomatic expenses of the Government for the year ending thirtieth of June, eighteen hundred and fifty-three, and for other purposes," passed thirty-first of August, eighteen hundred and fifty-two; and it shall be the duty of the clerks of the respective district courts of California to give thirty days' written notice to the judge of the court organized under this act of the time and place of the sitting of such district court for the discharge of such appellate jurisdiction; and in case the judge of such district court shall fail, from sickness or other casualty, to attend at such time and place, the judge of the court organized under this act is hereby authorized to hold said court and proceed with the business of the court, in accordance with the provisions prescribed for the regulation of said district court in the act of Congress hereinbefore referred to; and all appeals to the Supreme Court of the United States from the decisions of said district court, whether held by the last mentioned judge, or by him in conjunction with the district judge, or by the district judge alone, shall be taken in the manner prescribed by the act of Congress passed on the third day of March, eighteen hundred and fifty-one, entitled "An act to ascertain and settle the private land claims in the State of California."

SEC. 7. And be it further enacted, That the salary of the judge appointed under this act shall be four thousand five hundred dollars per annum, to commence from the date of his appointment.

SEC. 8. And be it further enacted, That all laws and parts of laws militating against this act be, and the same are hereby, repealed.

APPROVED, March 2, 1855.

PUBLIC, LX.—An Act changing the Times of holding the United States Courts in Tennessee.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That instead of the times heretofore fixed by law, the circuit and district courts of the United States for the several districts in Tennessee, shall hereafter be held as follows: At Jackson, on the third Mondays in March and September; at Knoxville, on the second Mondays in April and October; and at Nashville, on the first Mondays in May and November. And all writs, pleas, suits, recognizances, indictments, or other proceedings, civil or criminal, issued, commenced, or pending in either of said courts, shall be returnable to, be entered, and have day in court, and be heard and tried according to the times of holding said courts as herein provided.

APPROVED, March 2, 1855.

PUBLIC, LXI.—An Act to amend "An act to carry into effect a Treaty between the United States and Great Britain," signed on the fifth of June, eighteen hundred and fifty-four, and approved August fifth, eighteen hundred and fifty-four.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That from and after the date when the reciprocity treaty of the fifth June, eighteen hundred and fifty-four, entered into between Great Britain and the United States, shall go into effect, the Secretary of the Treasury shall be, and he is hereby, authorized and required, to refund, out of any money in the Treasury, to the several persons entitled thereto, such sums of money as shall have been collected as duties on "fish of all kinds, the products of fish, and of all other creatures living in the water," imported into the United States from and after the eleventh day of September, eighteen hundred and fifty-four, the date of the promulgation, by the President of the United States, of the reciprocity treaty aforesaid, on proof, satisfactory to the said Secretary, that the articles aforesaid were the products of some one of the British Provinces of New Brunswick, Canada, Nova Scotia, Newfoundland, or Prince Edward's Island, and imported therefrom into the United States, and duties duly paid thereon, which have not been refunded on export; and he is further authorized and required, from and after the day the treaty aforesaid shall go into effect, to cancel, on like satisfactory proof, any warehouse bonds to secure the duties that may have been given for any of said articles imported as aforesaid.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That from and after the date when the reciprocity treaty of the fifth of June, eighteen hundred and fifty-four, entered into between Great Britain and the United States, shall go into effect in the manner therein prescribed, the Secretary of the Treasury shall be, and he is hereby, authorized to refund, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to the persons entitled thereto, such sums of money as shall have been collected as duties on any of the articles enumerated in the schedule annexed to the third article of the reciprocity treaty aforesaid, imported into the United States from the British Provinces of Canada, New Brunswick, and Nova Scotia, respectively, since the date of the acts of their respective Governments admitting like articles into said Provinces from the United States free of duty, on proof, satisfactory to the said Secretary, that the articles so imported were the products of Canada, New Brunswick, or Nova Scotia, as the case may be, and imported therefrom into the United States, and that the duties were duly paid thereon; and he is further authorized and required to cancel, from and after the date the treaty aforesaid shall go into effect, on like satisfactory proof, any warehouse bonds to secure duties which may have been given for any of the said articles imported as aforesaid. And the Secretary of the Treasury is also hereby invested with the same authority and power to refund the duties or cancel the warehouse bonds on any of the articles enumerated in said treaty, the produce of Prince Edward's Island or Newfoundland, respectively, on said treaty going into operation, should it be proved, to the satisfaction of the said Secretary, that Prince Edward's Island, or Newfoundland, have admitted all of the articles enumerated in said treaty from the United States free of duty, prior to said treaty going into operation.

APPROVED, March 2, 1855.

PUBLIC, LXII.—An Act authorizing the Corporate Authorities of Georgetown to impose additional Taxes, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Mayor, Recorder, Aldermen, and Common Council, of Georgetown, be, and they are hereby, authorized and empowered to lay and collect a special annual tax of seventy-five cents, or so much thereof as may be necessary, upon every hundred dollars of property by law now taxable within the corporate limits of said town, and all money vested or held in any banking, insurance, brokerage, or exchange company, or institution, upon all State or corporation stocks, and money loaned at interest on bond, mortgage, or other evidence of indebtedness, in order to meet the engagements recently assumed by said town in subscribing to the stock of the Metropolitan Railroad Company; and to pledge the same to secure the said engagements, in such a manner that no part of the same shall, in any event, be applied to any other object, and the like remedy shall be used for the recovery thereof as is now used for the recovery of other public taxes in said town.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the said Corporation of Georgetown shall have full power and authority to introduce into said town a supply of water for the use of the inhabitants thereof, and to cause the streets, lanes, and alleys, or any of them, or any portion of any of them, to be lighted by gas or otherwise, and to provide for the expense of any such works or improvements, either by a special tax or out of its corporate funds generally, or both, at its discretion.

APPROVED, March 2, 1855.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That, upon the tract so to be selected and set apart, there shall be erected, under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, a marine hospital for said district, of faced brick exterior walls upon a hammered granite underpinning, one hundred and forty feet long, fifty-two feet deep in the center, and one hundred feet deep at the wings, and forty-five feet high from top of entrance-story floor to the eaves, with verandas to each story on each side between the wings, and on each end of the building; for the construction of which a sum equal to the proceeds of the sale hereinafter directed is hereby appropriated.

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That a tract of ten acres of the land heretofore purchased by the United States for the purposes of the naval hospital at Chelsea, Massachusetts, be selected and set apart, under the direction of the President of the United States, for the use of the marine hospital of the district of Boston and Charlestown.

SEC. 7. And be it further enacted, That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to sell and convey the land, with the buildings thereon, belonging to the United States, now occupied as the marine hospital at Chelsea, as may seem to be most advantageous to the United States; and he is hereby empowered to execute valid title deeds of the same to the purchaser or purchasers; and that the proceeds of such sales shall be paid into the Treasury of the United States.

SEC. 8. And be it further enacted, That the provisions contained in the second section of the act entitled "An act making appropriations for the civil and diplomatic expenses of the Government," approved the seventeenth day of June, eighteen hundred and forty-four, be required to be carried into effect in all particulars, any act in conflict therewith being hereby repealed; and all estimates for the compensation of officers of the Government authorized by law to be employed shall be based upon the expressed provisions of law, and not upon the authority of Executive distribution thereof; and the act and section authorizing the same, with the volume and page where such authority may be found, shall be cited in each and all estimates respectively.

SEC. 9. And be it further enacted, That the proper accounting officers of the Treasury be, and they are hereby, authorized and required to credit T. Butler King, late collector and depositary at San Francisco, in the sum of twelve thousand eight hundred and twenty-four dollars and ninety-eight cents, being the amount of money proved to have been lost by the destruction of the custom-house building and vault at San Francisco by the fire of May, eighteen hundred and fifty-one.

SEC. 10. And be it further enacted, That there shall be appointed, and paid in the manner now provided by law, four principal examiners and four assistant examiners of patents, in addition to the examining force now authorized by law to be so employed in the Patent Office; and should the necessities of the public service, in the estimation of the Commissioner of Patents, require any additional examining force to that herein provided, previous to the next session of Congress, there may also be appointed, and paid in the manner now provided by law, in addition to the foregoing, not exceeding two principal and two assistant examiners, who shall not so continue to be employed subsequent to the expiration of said next session of Congress without further provision of law.

That the second section of the act of thirty-first August, eighteen hundred and fifty-two, which provides "that the clerks, messengers, watchmen, and laborers employed at an annual salary, or in temporary positions, in the executive and legislative departments of the Government in the city of Washington, whose annual compensation does not exceed twelve hundred dollars, shall, in addition thereto, be allowed an increased compensation of twenty per cent," shall be construed to include the principal clerk at the National Observatory at Washington; and that hereafter the salary of said clerk shall be fifteen hundred dollars per annum.

And one thousand six hundred and ninety-six dollars and fifteen cents to supply a deficiency in the appropriation for building four steam dredge-boats in use by the War Department on Lakes Champlain, Erie, Michigan, and Ontario, to be applied for materials, machinery, tools, and labor furnished in painting said boats.

SEC. 11. And be it further enacted, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized to cause to be constructed the following buildings:

At Burlington, Vermont, a marine hospital, to cost not more than thirty-five thousand dollars.

At Wilmington, North Carolina, a marine hospital, including a pest-house, for the separate accommodation of patients with contagious and infective diseases, to cost not more than forty thousand dollars.

SEC. 12. And be it further enacted, That the several sums mentioned in the preceding section as the cost of the buildings therein authorized to be constructed, together with ten per cent. thereon to cover the compensation of architects, superintendents, advertising, and other contingent expenses, and so much as may be required to purchase suitable sites for said buildings, be, and the same are hereby, appropriated for the purposes aforesaid, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated: Provided, That no money hereby appropriated shall be used or applied for the purposes mentioned until a valid title for the land for the site of such building in each case shall be vested in the United States, and until the State shall also duly release and relinquish to the United States the right to tax or in any way assess said site or property of the United States that may be thereon during the time that the United States shall be or remain the owner thereof.

That the compensation of the collector of customs at Sandusky, Toledo, and Cleveland, be hereafter the same as is now allowed by law to the collector at Detroit.

That the provisions of the act of February twenty-sixth, eighteen hundred and fifty-three, "to regulate the fees and costs to be allowed clerks, marshals, and attorneys of the circuit and district courts of the United States, and for other purposes, are hereby extended to the Territories of Minnesota, New Mexico, and Utah, as fully in all particulars as they would be had the word "Territories" been inserted in the sixth line after the word "States," and the same had read "in the several States and in the Territories of the United States." This clause to take effect from and after the date of said act, and the accounting officers will settle the accounts within its purview accordingly.

For the building of a light-house on the Government reservation at Minnesota Point, near the head of Lake Superior, in the Territory of Minnesota, fifteen thousand dollars.

And for the construction of two light-houses in California, one at Crescent City, and one at Trinity Bay, fifteen thousand dollars each, should the Secretary of the Treasury decide that said light-houses were necessary, after proper examination and survey.

SEC. 13. And be it further enacted, That Franklin, in the collection district of Paso del Norte, Texas, be, and the same is hereby, made the port of entry of said district instead of Frontera; and the collector shall reside thereat.

SEC. 14. And be it further enacted, That the treaties made during the present Congress with the Indian tribes, and those to be made in future, shall be published as the laws and other treaties in the newspapers of such States and Territories as the Secretary of the Interior may think expedient.

That, in the settlement of the accounts of E. F. Beale, late superintendent of Indian affairs in California, the accounting officers of the Treasury be authorized to allow him the amount actually paid to an interpreter during the years eighteen hundred and fifty-three and eighteen hundred and fifty-four, upon producing satisfactory vouchers therefor.

SEC. 15. And be it further enacted, That the sum of seven hundred and sixty-five dollars, the balance of two thousand two hundred dollars, directed to be paid James F. Miller and Pyne-y-ohte-mah, or either of them, by the Senate amendment to the treaty with the Miami Indians, made in August, eighteen hundred and fifty-four, be, and the same is hereby, directed to be paid to the said Miller and Pyne-y-oh-te-mah, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

To pay this amount for interest due to the Chickasaws, at the rate of five per centum per annum, in pursuance of the treaty of eighteen hundred and thirty-two, on the sum of one hundred and twelve thousand forty-two dollars and ninety-nine cents improperly charged to said nation, according to the decision of the proper accounting officers of the Treasury, from the first of September, eighteen hundred and thirty-seven, until the ninth of March, eighteen hundred and fifty, seventy-two thousand nine hundred and sixty dollars and twenty-five cents.

SEC. 16. And be it further enacted, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to cause to be constructed the following buildings:

At Bristol, Rhode Island, for the accommodation of the custom-house and post office, a building of brick, with fire-proof floors, constructed of iron beams and brick work, iron roof, shutters, sills, &c., twenty-five feet by thirty, and twenty-five feet high, to cost not more than twelve thousand five hundred dollars.

APPROVED, March 3, 1855.

PUBLIC, LXIV.—An Act in addition to certain Acts granting Bounty Land to certain Officers and Soldiers who have been engaged in the Military Service of the United States.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That each of the surviving commissioned and non-commissioned officers, musicians, and privates, whether of regulars, volunteers, rangers, or militia, who were regularly mustered into the service of the United States, and every officer, commissioned and non-commissioned, seaman, ordinary seaman, marine, flotilla-man, clerk, and landsman in the Navy, in any of the wars in which this country has been engaged since seventeen hundred and ninety, and each of the survivors of the militia, or volunteers, or State troops of any State or Territory, called into military service, and regularly mustered therein, and whose services have been paid by the United States, shall be entitled to receive a certificate or warrant from the Department of the Interior for one hundred and sixty acres of land; and where any of those who have been so mustered into service and paid shall have received a certificate or warrant he shall be entitled to a certificate or warrant for such quantity of land as will make, in the whole, with what he may have heretofore received, one hundred and sixty acres to each such person having served as aforesaid: Provided, The person so having been in service shall not receive said land warrant if it shall appear by the muster-rolls of his regiment or corps that he deserted or was dishonorably discharged from service: Provided further, That the benefits of this section shall be held to extend to wagon-masters and teamsters who may have been employed, under the direction of competent authority in time of war, in the transportation of military stores and supplies.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That in case of the death of any person who, if living, would be entitled to a certificate or warrant as aforesaid under this act, leaving a widow, or, if no widow, a minor child or children, such widow, or, if no widow, such minor child or children, shall be entitled to receive a certificate or warrant for the same quantity of land that such deceased person would be entitled to receive under the provisions of this act if now living: Provided, That a subsequent marriage shall not impair the right of any such widow to such warrant if she be a widow at the time of making her application: And provided further, That those shall be considered minors who are so at the time this act shall take effect.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That in no case shall any such certificate or warrant be issued for any service less than fourteen days, except where the person shall actually have been engaged in battle, and unless the party claiming such certificate or warrant shall establish his or her right thereto by recorded evidence of said service.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That said certificates or warrants may be assigned, transferred, and located by the warrantees, their assignees, or their heirs-at-law, according to the provisions of existing laws regulating the assignment, transfer, and location of bounty land warrants.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That no warrant issued under the provisions of this act shall be located on any public lands except such as shall at the time be subject to sale at either the minimum or lower graduated prices.

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That the registers and receivers of the several land offices shall be severally authorized to charge and receive for their services in locating all warrants under the provisions of this act the same compensation or percentage to which they are entitled by law for sales of the public lands, for cash, at the rate of $1 25 per acre; the said compensation to be paid by the assignees or holders of such warrants.

SEC. 7. And be it further enacted, That the provisions of this act and all the bounty land laws heretofore passed by Congress, shall be extended to Indians, in the same manner and to the same extent as if the said Indians had been white men.

SEC. 8. And be it further enacted, That the officers and soldiers of the revolutionary war, or their widows or minor children, shall be entitled to the benefits of this act.

SEC. 9. And be it further enacted, That the benefits of this act shall be applied to and embrace those who served as volunteers at the invasion of Plattsburg, in September, 1814; also, at the battle of King's Mountain, in the revolutionary war, and the battle of Nickajock against the confederated savages of the South.

SEC. 10. And be it further enacted, That the provisions of this act shall apply to the chaplains who served with the army in the several wars of the country.

SEC. 11. And be it further enacted, That the provisions of this act be applied to those who served as volunteers at the attack on Lewistown, in Delaware, by the British fleet, in the war of 1812 and 1815.

APPROVED, March 3, 1855.

PUBLIC, LXV.—An Act to increase the Compensation of the Registers of Land Offices and Receivers of Public Moneys under the act entitled "An Act to Graduate and Reduce the Price of the Public Lands to Actual Settlers and Cultivators."

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That each register of a land office and receiver of public moneys shall receive the same amount of pay for each and every entry of land made under the act entitled "An act to graduate and reduce the price of the public lands to actual settlers and cultivators," approved August fourth, eighteen hundred and fifty-four, as such officer is by law entitled to receive for similar entries of land at the minimum price of one dollar and twenty-five cents per acre: Provided, That the whole amount received per year shall in no case exceed the limitation fixed by existing laws.

APPROVED, March 3, 1855.

PUBLIC, LXVI.—An Act making Appropriations for the Naval Service for the year ending the thirtieth of June, one thousand eight hundred and fifty-six.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the following sums be, and the same are hereby, appropriated, to be paid out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the year ending the thirtieth of June, one thousand eight hundred and fifty-six:

For pay of commission, warrant, and petty officers and seamen, including the engineer corps of the Navy, three million five hundred and fifteen thousand one hundred and eleven dollars: Provided, That the compensation of the chiefs of Bureau of Construction, Equipment, and Repair, and of Medicine and Surgery, be the same as now allowed to the other Chiefs of Bureaus of the Navy Department, and that the deficiency be paid out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

For pay of superintendents, naval constructors, and all the civil establishments at the several navy-yards and stations, one hundred and twenty-four thousand four hundred and eighty dollars. And such further sums as may be necessary for paying to the clerks and others in the Washington navy-yard the compensation authorized by the act approved April twenty-second, eighteen hundred and fifty-four. That in lieu of two thousand dollars per annum, the maximum of compensation now allowed by law to navy agents, there shall be allowed two per centum on the first hundred thousand dollars or under disbursed by them, and one per centum on every succeeding one hundred thousand dollars or under disbursed by them, until the compensation reaches the sum of three thousand dollars per annum, which amount shall be the maximum of compensation for said agents: Provided, That the compensation named herein shall be in lieu of all extra compensation for services of every nature and description rendered by navy agents, by order of the Navy Department, from and after the passage of this act: And provided further, That nothing herein contained shall be construed to reduce the salary to which any navy agent is entitled under existing laws.

For provisions for commission, warrant, and petty officers and seamen, including engineers and marines attached to vessels for sea-service, six hundred and eighty-six thousand two hundred dollars.

That the purser of the navy-yard at Washington, District of Columbia, shall, from and after the passage of this act, receive the same pay as is now allowed by law to the pursers at the navy-yards at Boston, New York, Norfolk, and Pensacola: Provided, That when pursers of the Navy shall be appointed inspectors of provisions, clothing, and small-stores, they shall, while so acting, receive the same compensation as the pursers of the navy-yard to which they may be attached.

For surgeons' necessaries and appliances for the sick and hurt of the Navy, including the marine corps, thirty-four thousand three hundred and twenty-five dollars.

For increase, repair, armament, and equipment of the Navy, including the wear and tear of vessels in commission, fuel for steamers, and purchase of hemp for the Navy, two million seven hundred and ninety-nine thousand five hundred dollars.

To continue the construction of the six steam frigates authorized to be built by an act of the first session of the Thirty-Third Congress, three million of dollars.

For Stevens's war steamer, two hundred and fifty thousand dollars: Provided, That the Secretary of the Navy may, at his discretion, apply the said sum, in whole or in part, during the fiscal year ending the thirtieth June, eighteen hundred and fifty-five.

That the sum of thirty-two thousand dollars be, and the same is hereby, appropriated, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of War, in the manner following, namely: Sixteen thousand dollars for the improvement of the road from Fort Union to Santa Fé; ten thousand dollars for the improvement of the road from Socalote to Albuquerque, via Canon Blanco, and Canon Carnue; and six thousand dollars for the improvement of the road from Canada, to Albiquea, all the said roads being in the Territory of New Mexico.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the board of officers appointed under the sixth section of the act making appropriations for the support of the Army for the year ending June thirtieth, eighteen hundred and fifty-three, approved August thirty-first, eighteen hundred and fifty-two, is hereby abolished: Provided, That it shall be lawful for the President of the United States to appoint, during the recess of Congress, such of the commissioned officers authorized by this act below the grade of field officer as may not be appointed during the present session whose commission shall expire on the first day of May, eighteen hundred and fifty-six.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That the provisions of an act entitled "An act for the payment of the civil officers employed in the Territory of New Mexico while under military government," approved July seventeenth, eighteen hundred and fifty-four, be, and the same are hereby, extended to embrace the case of Lieutenant Colonel J. M. Washington, deceased, late of the Army, for and during the period of his appointment and service as military Governor of New Mexico, ex officio superintendent of Indian affairs, and commander of the troops, prior to the formation of the civil government.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That the sum of thirty thousand dollars be, and the same is hereby, appropriated, to be expended under the direction of the War Department, in the purchase and importation of camels and dromedaries to be employed for military purposes.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That the provisions of the first section of the act entitled "An act making appropriations for the support of the Army for the year ending the thirtieth of June, one thousand eight hundred and fifty-one," approved September twenty-eight, eighteen hundred and fifty, granting extra pay to the officers and enlisted men of the Army serving in Oregon and California, be extended to the officers and men composing the garrison of the post of Fort Laramie, on the Oregon route, for the same period of time as was allowed by the sixth section of the act of third March, eighteen hundred and fifty-three, to the officers and men of the two companies of regiment of mounted riflemen that garrisoned Fort Laramie; and that the provisions of the same section of the same act be also extended to the officers and men composing the escort to the Mexican boundary commission while they were serving as such escort.

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That the laws granting extra pay to officers and soldiers who had served in California apply to chaplains who were attached to the army in California during the period embraced by such laws.

SEC. 7. And be it further enacted, That the annual distribution of arms to the several States, under the act approved April twenty-third, eighteen hundred and eight, entitled "An act making provision for arming and equipping the whole body of the militia of the United States," shall be hereafter made according to the number of their Representatives and Senators in Congress, respectively; and that arms be distributed to the Territories and the District of Columbia, in such quantities and under such regulations as the President, in his discretion, may prescribe: Provided, That the Secretary of War shall first equalize, as far as practicable, the number of arms heretofore distributed and now in possession of the several States, so that each State which has received less than its pro rata share shall receive a number sufficient to make an equal pro rata proportion for all the States according to the present number of their Representatives and Senators in Congress, respectively.

SEC. 8. And be it further enacted, That there shall be added to the Army two regiments of infantry and two regiments of cavalry, organized as in the existing force; and there shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, one brigadier general, and that the officers and men authorized by this act shall be entitled to the same provisions for wounds and disabilities, and the same provisions for widows and children, and the same allowances and benefits, in every respect, as are allowed to other troops composing the Army of the United States. They shall be subject to the rules and articles of war, and the men shall be recruited in the same manner as other troops, and with the same conditions and limitations.

SEC. 9. And be it further enacted, That, to enable the President of the United States to carry into effect the provisions of so much of this act as relates to the employment of an additional military force, such sum of money, not exceeding two million five hundred thousand dollars, as may be necessary, be, and the same hereby is, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

APPROVED, March 3, 1855.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the provisions of the act entitled "An act to grant the right of way to all rail and plank roads, and macadamized turnpikes passing through the public lands belonging to the United States," approved August fourth, eighteen hundred and fifty-two, be, and the same are hereby, extended to all of the public lands of the United States in the Territories of the United States.

APPROVED, March 3, 1855.

PUBLIC, LXXIV.—An Act to establish Columbus, in the State of Mississippi, Chattanooga, in the State of Tennessee, and Hickman, in the State of Kentucky, Ports of Delivery.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That Columbus, in the State of Mississippi, and within the collection district of Mobile, Chattanooga, in the State of Tennessee, and Hickman, in the State of Kentucky, and within the collection district of Mississippi, be, and hereby are, declared to be ports of delivery within their respective collection districts. And there shall be appointed a surveyor of customs, to reside at each of said ports, who shall perform the duties, and receive the compensation and emoluments prescribed in the act of Congress, approved March the second, eighteen hundred and thirty-one, being "An act allowing the duties on foreign merchandise imported into Pittsburgh, Wheeling, Cincinnati, Louisville, St. Louis, Nashville, and Natchez, to be secured and paid at those places:" Provided, That whenever the amount of duties paid at any one of said ports shall be less than the sum of ten thousand dollars per year, the Secretary of the Treasury shall discontinue such port of delivery.

APPROVED, March 3, 1855.

PUBLIC, LXXV.—An Act for the Construction of certain Military Roads in the Territory of Kansas.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the sum of fifty thousand dollars be, and the same is hereby, appropriated, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the construction of a road from Fort Riley to such point on the Arkansas river as may, in the opinion of the Secretary of War, be most expedient for military purposes.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the further sum of fifty thousand dollars be, and the same is hereby, appropriated, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the construction of a road from Fort Riley to Bridger's Pass, in the Rocky mountains. The said sums to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of War, in pursuance of contracts to be made by him.

APPROVED, March 3, 1855.

PUBLIC, LXXVI.—An Act to organize an Institution for the Insane of the Army and Navy and of the District of Columbia, in the said District.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the title of the institution shall be the Government Hospital for the Insane; and its objects shall be the most humane care and enlightened curative treatment of the insane of the Army and Navy of the United States and of the District of Columbia.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That nine citizens of the District of Columbia, to be appointed by the President of the United States, shall constitute a Board of Visiters of the said hospital. The term of office of three of the nine visiters shall expire the thirtieth day of June, eighteen hundred and fifty-seven, and biennially thereafter on the same day of the year, when they shall be reappointed or three other citizens appointed in their stead. The order in which the terms of office of the first nine appointees shall expire shall be determined by lot; and should any vacancy occur by death, resignation, or otherwise, such vacancy shall be filled by appointment for the unexpired term of such visiter. The Board of Visitors, subject to the approval of the Secretary of the Interior, may make any needful by-laws for the government of themselves and of the superintendent and his employees, and of the patients, not inconsistent with this act nor with the Constitution and laws of the United States; they shall visit the hospital at stated periods, and exercise so careful a supervision over its expenditures and general operations that the Government and community may have confidence in the correctness of its management; they shall make annually, to the Secretary of the Interior, a report for the preceding year ending June thirtieth, setting forth the condition and wants of the institution. The board shall elect one of their number president, who shall preside at their meetings for one year, or till a successor is elected. The office of visiter shall be honorary and without compensation.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That the chief executive officer of the institution shall be a superintendent, to be appointed by the Secretary of the Interior, and to receive a salary of two thousand five hundred dollars per annum. The superintendent shall be a well-educated physician, possessing competent experience in the care and treatment of the insane; he shall reside on the premises and devote his whole time to the welfare of the institution; he shall, subject to the approval of the visiters, engage and discharge all needful and usual employees in the care of the insane, and all laborers on the farm, and determine their wages and duties; he shall be the responsible disbursing agent of the institution, and shall be ex-officio secretary of the Board of Visiters; and he shall give bond for the faithful performance of his duties in such sum and with such securities as may be required by the Secretary of the Interior.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That the order of the Secretary of War and that of the Secretary of the Navy shall authorize the superintendent to receive insane persons belonging to the Army and Navy respectively, and keep them in custody till they are cured or removed by the same authority which ordered their reception.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That all indigent insane persons residing in the District of Columbia at the time they became insane shall be entitled to the benefits of the institution, and shall be admitted on the authority of the Secretary of the Interior, which he may grant after due process of law showing the person to be insane and unable to support himself (or herself) and family (or themselves, if they have no family) under the visitation of insanity.

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That whenever there are vacancies, private patients from the District may be received at a rate of board to be determined by the visiters, but to be in no case less than the actual cost of their support.

SEC. 7. And be it further enacted, That all appropriations of money by Congress for the support of the institution shall be drawn from the Treasury on the requisition of the Secretary of the Interior, and shall be disbursed and accounted for in all respects according to the laws regulating ordinary disbursements of public money.

SEC. 8. And be it further enacted, That this act shall take effect from and after the first day of July, one thousand eight hundred and fifty-five.

APPROVED, March 3, 1855.

PUBLIC, LXXVII.—An Act further to amend the act entitled "An act to reduce and modify the Rates of Postages in the United States, and for other purposes," passed March three, eighteen hundred and fifty-one.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That, in lieu of the rates of postage now established by law, there shall be charged the following rates, to wit:

For every single letter in manuscript, or paper of any kind in which information shall be asked for or communicated in writing, or by marks or signs, conveyed in the mail for any distance between places in the United States not exceeding three thousand miles, three cents; and for any distance exceeding three thousand miles, ten cents.

And for a double letter there shall be charged double the rate above specified; and for a treble letter, treble those rates; and for a quadruple letter, quadruple those rates; and every letter or parcel not exceeding half an ounce in weight shall be deemed a single letter, and every additional weight of half an ounce, or additional weight of less than half an ounce, shall be charged with an additional single postage; and upon all letters passing through or in the mail of the United States, except such as are to or from a foreign country, the postages as above specified shall be prepaid, except upon letters and packages addressed to officers of the Government on official business, which shall be so marked on the envelop. And from and after the first day of January, eighteen hundred and fifty-six, the Postmaster General may require postmasters to place postage stamps upon all prepaid letters upon which such stamps may not have been placed by the writers.

And all drop-letters or letters placed in any post office not for transmission through the mail, but for delivery only, shall be charged with postage at the rate of one cent each; and all letters which shall hereafter be advertised as remaining over, or uncalled for, in any post office, shall be charged with one cent each, in addition to the regular postage, both to be accounted for as other postages now are.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That it shall not be lawful for any postmaster or other person to sell any postage stamp or stamped envelop for any larger sum than that indicated upon the face of such postage stamp, or for a larger sum than that charged therefor by the Post Office Department; and any person who shall violate this provision shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and, on conviction thereof, shall be fined in any sum not less than ten, nor more than five hundred dollars. This act to take effect and be in force from and after the commencement of the next fiscal quarter after its passage: Provided, That nothing herein contained shall be so construed as to alter the laws in relation to the franking privilege.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That for the greater security of valuable letters posted for transmission in the mails of the United States, the Postmaster General be, and hereby is, authorized to establish a uniform plan for the registration of such letters on application of parties posting the same, and to require the prepayment of the postage, as well as a registration fee of five cents on every such letter or packet, to be accounted for by postmasters receiving the same in such manner as the Postmaster General shall direct: Provided, however, That such registration shall not be compulsory; and it shall not render the Post Office Department or its revenue liable for the loss of such letters or packets, or the contents thereof.

APPROVED, March 3, 1855.

PUBLIC, LXXVIII.—An Act to Improve the Laws of the District of Columbia and to Codify the same.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the President of the United States is hereby authorized, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to appoint two persons, learned in the law, to revise, simplify, digest, and codify the laws of said District, and also the rules and principles of practice, of pleadings, of evidence, and conveyancing, and also to add thereto and codify such laws of the State of Maryland as may be, or become in force during the preparation of said code, and applicable to the circumstances and condition of said District; and the said code shall be constructed according to a simple method, and be expressed in language concise and plain, and, as far as possible, be made level to the understanding of a person of ordinary intelligence and education; and it shall contain a full and particular index to all its contents; and the preparation of the said code shall be made under the superintendence and revision of the Attorney General of the United States, and as the same progresses shall be printed, under his direction; and the said codifiers shall each be paid for their services, out of the Treasury of the United States, at the rate of three thousand dollars a year. And the Board of Aldermen and Common Council of the city of Washington may together elect five competent persons, and the Board of Aldermen and Council of Georgetown may elect two competent persons, and the levy court of the county of Washington may elect one competent person, which persons together shall compose a board, to consider, at convenient seasons, the provisions of said code, as it may be prepared; and any three of said persons shall constitute a quorum of said board; and the said code, or such provisions thereof as may be approved by a majority of said board, shall be adopted, and become the law of said District, as hereinafter provided. And it shall be the duty of the said persons who may be appointed to codify the said laws, to attend, and also the said Attorney General may attend the meetings of said board, to explain the several provisions of the said code. And when the said code and the provisions thereof shall have been adopted by the said board, or by a majority thereof, they shall certify the same to the President of the United States, who shall thereupon cause it to be published in a neat and convenient form, and to be substantially bound; and he shall cause a sufficient number of volumes of said code to be printed and bound as may be necessary for the amplest distribution of the same among the people of said District and for the preservation of said code; and a copy thereof shall be furnished to every justice of the peace, and every judge, to each court, to each clerk of said court, to each coroner, to said levy court, to each public school, to each public library, to each public department of Government, and to the Mayors and each of the Councils of Washington and Georgetown, to be by them kept and carefully preserved and transferred to their several successors in office. And the said code so deposited with said clerks of courts and justices of the peace, shall at all times be open in their several offices for the inspection and information of the people of said District and others who may desire to consult the same. And when the said code shall be printed and distributed, the President of the United States shall, by his proclamation, appoint a time and places in the said district for taking the sense of the citizens thereof, for or against the adoption of the said code, and he shall cause judges to be selected who shall preside at such election, and he shall provide and proclaim the mode and rules of conducting the same, provided every free white male citizen of the United States, above the age of twenty-one years, who has resided in the said District for one year next preceding said election, shall be permitted to vote thereat; and the result of said election shall be reported to the said President, and the same, with the said code, be by him reported to Congress, and when ratified and approved by the same, he shall, by his proclamation, declare it to be in force, from the day of the date thereof, as the law of the said District of Columbia; and the same, when so proclaimed, shall thereafter be and remain as such, without any further act or proceedings to that effect, until altered or repealed by the Congress of the United States. And the persons who may compose said board, or such of them as may act on the same, shall be paid out of the Treasury of the United States a reasonable compensation for their services, according to the time employed by them, respectively, upon the same: Provided, That the said code shall be reported to Congress on or before the first Monday in December, in the year eighteen hundred and fifty-seven.

APPROVED, March 3, 1855.

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That no envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary, commissioner, secretary of legation, dragoman, interpreter, consul, or commercial agent, who shall, after the thirtieth day of June next, be appointed to any of the countries or places herein named, shall be entitled to compensation until he shall have reached his post and entered upon his official duties.

SEC. 7. And be it further enacted, That the compensation of every envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary, commissioner, secretary of legation, dragoman, interpreter, consul, and commercial agent, who shall, after the thirtieth day of June next, be appointed to any of the countries or places herein named, shall cease on the day that his successor shall enter upon the duties of his office.

SEC. 8. And be it further enacted, That no envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary, commissioner, secretary of legation, dragoman, interpreter, consul, or commercial agent, shall absent himself from the country to which he is accredited, or from his consular district, for a longer period than ten days, without having previously obtained leave from the President of the United States, and that during his absence for any period longer than that time, either with or without leave, his salary shall not be allowed him.

SEC. 9. And be it further enacted, That the President shall appoint no other than citizens of the United States, who are residents thereof, or who shall be abroad in the employment of the Government at the time of their appointment, as envoys extraordinary and ministers plenipotentiary, commissioners, secretaries of legation, dragomans, interpreters, consuls, or commercial agents, nor shall other than citizens of the United States be employed either as vice consul, or consular agents, or as clerks in the offices of either, and have access to the archives therein deposited.

SEC. 10. And be it further enacted, That envoys extraordinary and ministers plenipotentiary and consuls shall be required to locate their legations and consulates, in the places in which they are established, in as central a position as can be conveniently procured, and keep them open daily from ten o'clock in the morning until four o'clock in the afternoon; Sundays, other holidays, and anniversaries excepted.

SEC. 11. And be it further enacted, That as soon as a consul or commercial agent shall be officially notified of his appointment, he shall execute a bond with two sureties, in a sum of not less than one thousand nor more than ten thousand dollars, for the faithful discharge of every duty relating to his office; which bond shall be satisfactory to the United States district attorney for the district in which the appointed consul resides, and be transmitted to the Secretary of State for his approval. If the consul is not in the United States at the time he is commissioned, as soon as he is apprised of the fact he shall sign, and transmit by the most expeditious conveyance, a bond like the aforesaid, which shall afterwards be undersigned by two sureties who are permanent residents of the United States, and approved by the State Department. Where there is a United States legation in a country to which a consul shall be appointed, application shall be made through it to the Government for an exequatur; but where there is none the application shall be made direct to the proper Department.

SEC. 12. And be it further enacted, That it shall be the duty of consuls and commercial agents to charge the following fees for performing the services specified, for which, under the penalty of being removed from office, they shall account to the Government at the expiration of every three months, and hold the proceeds subject to its drafts:

For receiving and delivering ships' papers, half cent. on every ton, registered measurement, of the vessel for which the service is performed.

For every seaman who may be discharged or shipped at the consulate or commercial agency, or in the port in which they are located, one dollar; which shall be paid by the master of the vessel.

For every other certificate, except passports, the signing and verification of which shall be free, two dollars.

SEC. 13. And be it further enacted, That in capitals where a legation of the United States is established consuls and commercial agents shall only be permitted to grant and verify passports in the absence of the United States diplomatic representative.

SEC. 14. And be it further enacted, That no commission shall in future be charged by consuls or commercial agents for receiving or disbursing the wages or extra wages to which seamen may be entitled who are discharged by the masters of vessels in foreign countries, or for moneys advanced to such as may be found in distress, seeking relief from the consulate or commercial agency; nor shall any consul or commercial agent be directly or indirectly interested in any profits derived from clothing, boarding, or sending home such seamen.

SEC. 15. And be it further enacted, That no consul or commercial agent of the United States shall discharge any mariner, being a citizen of the United States, in a foreign port, without requiring the payment of the two months' wages to which said mariner is entitled under the provisions of the act of February twenty-eight, eighteen hundred and three, unless, upon due investigation into the circumstances under which the master and mariner have jointly applied for such discharge, and on a private examination of such mariner by the consul or commercial agent, separate and apart from all officers of the vessel, the consul or commercial agent shall be satisfied that it is for the interest and welfare of such mariner to be so discharged; nor shall any consul or commercial agent discharge any mariner as aforesaid without requiring the full amount of three months' wages, as provided by the above named act, unless under such circumstances as will, in his judgment, secure the United States from all liability to expense on account of such mariner: Provided, That in the cases of stranded vessels, or vessels condemned as unfit for service, no payment of extra wages shall be required; and where any mariner, after his discharge, shall have incurred expense at the port of discharge before shipping again, such expense shall be paid out of the two months' wages aforesaid, and the balance only delivered to him.

SEC. 16. And be it further enacted, That every consul and commercial agent of the United States shall keep a detailed list of all mariners discharged by them, respectively, specifying their names and the names of the vessels from which they were discharged, and the payments, if any, afterwards made on account of each, and shall make official returns of said lists half yearly to the Treasury Department.

SEC. 17. And be it further enacted, That every consul and commercial agent of the United States shall make an official entry of every discharge which they may grant, respectively, on the list of the crew and shipping articles of the vessel from which such discharge shall be made, specifying the payment, if any, which has been required in each case, and if they shall have remitted the payment of the two months' wages to which the mariner is entitled, they shall also certify on said shipping list and articles that they have allowed the remission upon the joint application of the master and mariner therefor, after a separate examination of the mariner, after a due investigation of all the circumstances, and after being satisfied that the discharge so allowed, without said payment, is for the interest and welfare of the mariner; and if they shall have remitted the payment of the one month's wages to which the United States is entitled, they shall certify that they have allowed the remission after a due investigation of all the circumstances, and after being satisfied that they are such as will, in their judgment, secure the United States from all liability to expense on account of such mariner; and a copy of all such entries and certificates shall be annually transmitted to the Treasury Department by the proper officers of the customs in the several ports of the United States.

SEC. 18. And be it further enacted, That if any consul or commercial agent of the United States, upon discharging a mariner without requiring the payment of the one month's wages to which the United States is entitled, shall neglect to certify in the manner required in such case by the preceding section of this act, he shall be accountable to the Treasury Department for the sum so remitted. And in any action brought by a mariner to recover the extra wages to which he is entitled under the act of February twenty-eight, eighteen hundred and three, the defense that the payment of such wages was duly remitted shall not be sustained without the production of the certificate in such case required by this act, or, when its non-production is accounted for, by the production of a certified copy thereof, and the truth of the facts certified to, and the propriety of the remission shall be still open to investigation.

SEC. 19. And be it further enacted, That if, upon the application of any mariner, it shall appear to the consul or commercial agent that he is entitled to his discharge under any act of Congress, or according to the general principles of the maritime law as recognized in the United States, he shall discharge such mariner, and shall require of the master the payment of three months' wages, as provided in the act of February twenty-eighth, eighteen hundred and three, and shall not remit the same, or any part thereof, except in the cases mentioned in the proviso of the ninth clause of the first section of the act of July twentieth, eighteen hundred and forty, to the following effect: "If the consul or other commercial agent shall be satisfied the contract has expired, or the voyage been protracted by circumstances beyond the control of the master, and without any design on his part to violate the articles of shipment, then he may, if he deems it just, discharge the mariner without exacting the three months' additional pay."

SEC. 20. And be it further enacted, That every consul or commercial agent, for any neglect to perform the duties enjoined upon him by this act, shall be liable to any injured person for all damages occasioned thereby; and for any violation of the provisions of the fifteenth and nineteenth sections of this act shall also be liable to indictment and to a penalty, in the manner provided by the eighteenth clause of the first section of the act of July twentieth, eighteen hundred and forty.

SEC. 21. And be it further enacted, That the act of April fourteenth, seventeen hundred and ninety-two, concerning consuls, &c., is hereby so amended that if any American citizen dying abroad shall, by will or any other writing, leave special directions for the management and settlement by the consul of the personal or other property which he may die possessed of in the country where he may die, it shall be the duty of the consul, where the laws of the country permit, strictly to observe the directions so given by the deceased; or if such citizen so dying shall, by will or any other writing, have appointed any other person than the consul to take charge of and settle his affairs, in that case it shall be the duty of the consul, when and so often as required by the so-appointed agent or trustee of the deceased, to give his official aid in whatever way may be necessary to facilitate the operations of such trustee or agent, and, where the laws of the country permit, to protect the property of the deceased from any interference of the local authorities of the country in which he may have died; and to this end it shall also be the duty of the consul to place his official seal on all or any portions of the property of the deceased as may be required by the said agent or trustee, and to break and remove the same seal when required by the agent or trustee, and not otherwise; he, the said consul or commercial agent, receiving therefor two dollars for each seal, which, like all other fees for consular service, including all charges for extension of protest, as also such commissions as are allowed by existing laws on settlement of estates of American citizens by consuls and commercial agents, shall be reported to the Treasury Department, and held subject to its order.

SEC. 22. And be it further enacted, That the following record-books shall be provided for and kept in each consulate and commercial agency: A letter-book, into which shall be copied, in the English language, all official letters and notes, in the order of their dates, which are written by the consul or commercial agent; a book for the entry of protests, and in which all other official consular acts likewise shall be recorded; and at sea-ports a book wherein shall be recorded the list of crew, and the age, tonnage, owner or owners, name and place to which she belongs, of every American vessel which arrives. Consuls and commercial agents shall make quarterly returns to their Government, specifying the amount of fees received, the number of vessels, and the amount of their tonnage, which have arrived and departed; the number of seamen, and what portion of them are protected; and, as nearly as possible, the nature and value of their cargoes, and where produced.

SEC. 23. And be it further enacted, That as soon as a consul or commercial agent shall have received his exequatur; or been provisionally recognized, he shall apply to his predecessor for the archives of the consulate or commercial agency, and make an inventory of the papers, and such other articles as they may contain, for which he shall pass a receipt and transmit a copy thereof to the State Department.

SEC. 24. And be it further enacted, That the Secretary of State be, and he is hereby, authorized to prescribe such additional regulations for the keeping of consular books and records, and insuring proper returns, as the public interest may require.

SEC. 25. And be it further enacted, That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized to bestow the title of consul general upon any United States consul in Asia or Africa, when, in his opinion, such title will promote the public interest.

SEC. 26. And be it further enacted, That all acts and parts of acts authorizing attachés to any of our legations, or the payments to ministers and consuls of the United States of outfits or infits, or salaries for clerk hire and office rent, be, and the same are hereby, repealed.

SEC. 27. And be it further enacted, That the provisions of this act take effect from and after the thirtieth of June next, any law or laws of the United States to the contrary notwithstanding.

APPROVED, March 1, 1855.

PUBLIC, LXXX.—An Act for the Relief of Purchasers and Locators of Swamp and Overflowed Lands.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the President of the United States cause patents to be issued as soon as practicable to the purchaser or purchasers, locator or locators, who have made entries of the public lands, claimed as swamp lands, either with cash or with land warrants, or with scrip, prior to the issue of patents to the State or States, as provided for by the second section of the act approved September twenty-eight, eighteen hundred and fifty, entitled "An act to enable the State of Arkansas and other States to reclaim the swamp lands within their limits," any decision of the Secretary of the Interior or other officer of the Government of the United States to the contrary notwithstanding: Provided, That in all cases where any State, through its constituted authorities, may have sold or disposed of any tract or tracts of said land to any individual or individuals prior to the entry, sale, or location of the same under the preëmption or other laws of the United States, no patent shall be issued by the President for such tract or tracts of land until such State, through its constituted authorities, shall release its claim thereto in such form as shall be prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior: And provided further, That if such State shall not, within ninety days from the passage of this act, through its constituted authorities, return to the General Land Office of the United States a list of all the lands sold as aforesaid, together with the dates of such sale and the names of the purchasers, the patents shall be issued immediately thereafter, as directed in the foregoing section.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That upon due proof by the authorized agent of the State or States before the Commissioner of the General Land Office, that any of the lands purchased or located were swamp lands, within the true intent and meaning of the act aforesaid, the purchase money shall be paid over to the said State or States; and where the lands have been located by warrants or scrip, the said State or States shall be authorized to locate a quantity of like amount upon any of the public lands subject to entry at one dollar and a quarter per acre, or less, and patents shall issue therefor, upon the terms and conditions enumerated in the act aforesaid: Provided, however, That the said decisions of the Commissioner of the General Land Office shall be approved by the Secretary of the Interior.

APPROVED, March 2, 1855.

PUBLIC, LXXXI.—An Act allowing the further time of two years to those holding Lands by entries in the Virginia Military District in Ohio, which were made prior to the first of January, eighteen hundred and fifty-two, to have the same Surveyed and Patented.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the officers and soldiers of the Virginia line on Continental establishment, their heirs or assigns, entitled to bounty lands, which have, prior to the first day of January, anno Domini eighteen hundred and fifty-two, been entered within the tract reserved by Virginia, between Little Miami and Sciota rivers, for satisfying the legal bounties to her officers and soldiers upon Continental establishment, shall be allowed the further time of two years from and after the passage of this act to make and return their surveys and warrants, or certified copies of warrants, to the General Land Office.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the act entitled "An act allowing the further time of two years to those holding lands by entries in the Virginia military district in Ohio, which were made prior to first January, eighteen hundred and fifty-two, to have the same surveyed and patented," approved December nineteeth, eighteen hundred and fifty-four, be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

APPROVED, March 3, 1855.

PUBLIC, LXXXII.—An Act in addition to certain acts granting Bounty Land to certain Officers and Soldiers who have been engaged in the Military Service of the United States.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That each of the surviving commissioned and non-commissioned officers, musicians, and privates, whether of regulars, volunteers, rangers, or militia, who were regularly mustered into the service of the United States, and every officer, commissioned and non-commissioned, seaman, ordinary seaman, marine, flotilla-man, clerk, and landsman in the Navy, in any of the wars in which this country has been engaged since seventeen hundred and ninety, and each of the survivors of the militia, or volunteers, or State troops of any State or Territory, called into military service, and regularly mustered therein, and whose services have been paid by the United States, shall be entitled to receive a certificate or warrant from the Department of the Interior for one hundred and sixty acres of land; and where any of those who have been so mustered into service and paid shall have received a certificate or warrant, he shall be entitled to a certificate or warrant for such quantity of land as will make, in the whole, with what he may have heretofore received, one hundred and sixty acres to each such person having served as aforesaid: Provided, The person so having been in service shall not receive said land warrant if it shall appear by the muster-rolls of his regiment or corps that he deserted, or was dishonorably discharged from service: Provided further, That the benefits of this section shall be held to extend to wagon-masters and teamsters who may have been employed, under the direction of competent authority in time of war, in the transportation of military stores and supplies.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That in case of the death of any person who, if living, would be entitled to a certificate or warrant as aforesaid under this act, leaving a widow, or, if no widow, a minor child or children, such widow, or, if no widow, such minor child or children, shall be entitled to receive a certificate or warrant for the same quantity of land that such deceased person would be entitled to receive under the provisions of this act if now living: Provided, That a subsequent marriage shall not impair the right of any such widow to such warrant if she be a widow at the time of making her application: And provided further, That those shall be considered minors who are so at the time this act shall take effect.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That in no case shall any such certificate or warrant be issued for any service less than fourteen days, except where the person shall actually have been engaged in battle, and unless the party claiming such certificate or warrant shall establish his or her right thereto by recorded evidence of said service.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That said certificates or warrants may be assigned, transferred, and located by the warrantees, their assignees, or their heirs-at-law, according to the provisions of existing laws regulating the assignment, transfer, and location of bounty-land warrants.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That no warrant issued under the provisions of this act shall be located on any public lands, except such as shall at the time be subject to sale at either the minimum or lower graduated prices.

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That the registers and receivers of the several land offices shall be severally authorized to charge and receive for their services in locating all warrants under the provisions of this act the same compensation or percentage to which they are entitled by law for sales of the public lands, for cash, at the rate of one dollar and twenty-five cents per acre. The said compensation to be paid by the assignees or holders of such warrants.

SEC. 7. And be it further enacted, That the provisions of this act, and all the bounty-land laws heretofore passed by Congress, shall be extended to Indians, in the same manner and to the same extent as if the said Indians had been white men.

SEC. 8. And be it further enacted, That the officers and soldiers of the revolutionary war, or their widows or minor children, shall be entitled to the benefits of this act.

SEC. 9. And be it further enacted, That the benefits of this act shall be applied to and embrace those who served as volunteers at the invasion of Plattsburg, in September, eighteen hundred and fourteen; also at the battle of King's Mountain, in the revolutionary war, and the battle of Nickojock, against the confederated savages of the South.

SEC. 10. And be it further enacted, That the provisions of this act shall apply to the chaplains who served with the Army in the several wars of the country.

SEC. 11. And be it further enacted, That the provisions of this act be applied to those who served as volunteers at the attack on Lewistown, in Delaware, by the British fleet, in the war of eighteen hundred and twelve—fifteen.

APPROVED, March 3, 1855.

PUBLIC, LXXXIII.—An Act to change the Boundaries of the Land Districts in the State of Iowa, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That all that portion of the public lands in the State of Iowa lying north of township line dividing townships ninety-three and ninety-four, and east of the range line dividing ranges twenty-four and twenty-five, shall constitute a new land district to be called the Turkey River district. That all that portion of the public lands in said State now situated in the northern land district which lies north of the township line dividing townships eighty-five and eighty-six, and not included in the Turkey River and Dubuque districts, shall constitute a new land district to be called the Fort Dodge district, and the name of the northern district is hereby changed to, and shall be hereafter called, the Fort Des Moines district. That all that portion of the public lands in said State now lying in Kanesville district, and situated north of the township line dividing townships eighty-five and eighty-six, shall constitute a new land district to be called the Sioux River district, and the name of the Kanesville district is hereby changed to, and shall be hereafter called, the Council Bluffs district. That townships eighty-six, eighty-seven, eighty-eight, eighty-nine, ninety, ninety-one, ninety-two, and ninety-three, of ranges seventeen and eighteen, are hereby attached to, and made a part of, the Dubuque land district, and townships sixty-seven, sixty-eight, sixty-nine, seventy, seventy-one, seventy-two, seventy-three, seventy-four, and seventy-five, of ranges thirty-two and thirty-three, are hereby attached to, and made a part of, the Charitan land district.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized to appoint, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, a register and a receiver of the public moneys for each of the districts respectively hereby created, who shall each be required to reside at the site of the respective office to which he may be appointed, and who shall have the same powers, perform the same duties, and be entitled to the same compensation as are or may be prescribed by law in relation to other land officers of the United States.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That the President of the United States is authorized to cause the public lands in said districts respectively (with the exception of sections numbered sixteen in each township, reserved for the use of schools, or such lands as may be selected by law in lieu thereof, and such other tracts as may be selected for military or other purposes) to be exposed to sale in the same manner and upon the same terms and conditions as the other public lands of the United States.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That the President of the United States is hereby authorized to designate the sites at which such of the several offices shall be established, and to remove the same to any other places within said districts respectively whenever, in his opinion, it may be deemed expedient.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That any locations or sales of land in either of the districts of land now subject to sale at Dubuque, Fort Des Moines, or Kanesville, after the passage of this act and before the receipt by the land officers respectively thereat, of instructions from Commissioner of the General Land Office under this act shall be as good and valid in law as if this act had not been passed.

APPROVED, March 3, 1855.

PUBLIC, LXXXIV.—An Act to Regulate the Carriage of Passengers in Steamships and other Vessels.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That no master of any vessel, owned in whole or in part by a citizen of the United States, or by a citizen of any foreign country, shall take on board such vessel, at any foreign port or place, other than foreign contiguous territory of the United States, a greater number of passengers than in proportion of one to every two tons of such vessel, not including children under the age of one year in the computation, and computing two children over one and under eight years of age as one passenger. That the spaces appropriated for the use of such passengers, and which shall not be occupied by stores or other goods not the personal baggage of such passengers, shall be in the following proportions, viz: On the main and poop decks or platforms and in the deck houses, if there be any, one passenger for each sixteen clear superficial feet of deck, if the height or distance between the decks or platform shall not be less than six feet; and on the lower deck, (not being an orlop deck,) if any, one passenger for eighteen such clear superficial feet, if the height or distance between the decks or platforms shall not be less than six feet, but so as that no passenger shall be carried on any other deck or platform, nor upon any deck where the height or distance between decks is less than six feet, with intent to bring such passenger to the United States, and shall leave such port or place and bring the same, or any number thereof, within the jurisdiction of the United States; or if any such master of any vessel shall take on board his vessel, at any port or place within the jurisdiction of the United States, any greater number of passengers than in the proportion aforesaid to the space aforesaid, or to the tonnage aforesaid, with intent to carry the same to any foreign port or place other than foreign contiguous territory as aforesaid, every such master shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and, upon conviction thereof, before any circuit or district court of the United States, shall, for each passenger taken on board beyond the limit aforesaid, or the space aforesaid, be fined in the sum of fifty dollars, and may also be imprisoned, at the discretion of the judge before whom the penalty shall be recovered, not exceeding six months; but should it be necessary for the safety or convenience of the vessel, that any portion of her cargo or any other articles, or article, should be placed on, or stored in, any of the decks, cabins, or other places appropriated to the use of passengers, the same may be placed in lockers or inclosures prepared for the purpose, on an exterior surface impervious to the wave, capable of being cleansed in like manner as the decks or platforms of the vessel. In no case, however, shall the places thus provided be deemed to be a part of the space allowable for the use of passengers, but the same shall be deducted therefrom; and in all cases where prepared or used, the upper surface of said lockers on inclosed spaces shall be deemed and taken to be the deck or platform from which measurement shall be made for all the purposes of this act. It is also provided that one hospital in the spaces appropriated to passengers, and separate therefrom by an appropriate partition, and furnished as its purposes require, may be prepared, and, when used, may be included in the space allowable for passengers, but the same shall not occupy more than one hundred superficial feet of deck or platform: Provided, That on board two-deck ships, where the height between the decks is seven and one half feet or more, fourteen clear superficial feet of deck shall be the proportion required for each passenger.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That no such vessel shall have more than two tiers of berths, and the interval between the lowest part thereof and the deck or platform beneath shall not be less than nine inches, and the berths shall be well constructed, parallel with the sides of the vessel, and separated from each other by partitions, as berths ordinarily are separated, and shall be at least six feet in length and at least two feet in width, and each berth shall be occupied by no more than one passenger; but double berths, of twice the above width, may be constructed, each berth to be occupied by no more, and by no other, than two women, or by one woman, and two children under the age of eight years, or by husband and wife, or by a man, and two of his own children under the age of eight years, or by two men, members of the same family; and if there shall be any violation of this section in any of its provisions, then the master of the vessel and the owners thereof shall severally forfeit and pay the sum of five dollars for each passenger on board of said vessel on such voyage, to be recovered by the United States in any port where such vessel may arrive or depart.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That all vessels, whether of the United States or any foreign country, having sufficient capacity or space according to law for fifty or more passengers (other than cabin passengers) shall, when employed in transporting such passengers between the United States and Europe, have, on the upper deck, for the use of such passengers, a house over the passage-way leading to the apartments allotted to such passengers below deck, firmly secured to the deck or combings of the hatch, with two doors, the sills of which shall be at least one foot above the deck, so constructed that one door or window in such house may at all times be left open for ventilation; and all vessels so employed, and having the capacity to carry one hundred and fifty such passengers or more, shall have two such houses; and the stairs or ladder leading down to the aforesaid apartment shall be furnished with a hand-rail of wood or strong rope; but booby hatches may be substituted for such houses.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That every such vessel so employed, and having the legal capacity for more than one hundred such passengers, shall have at least two ventilators to purify the apartment or apartments occupied by such passengers; one of which shall be inserted in the after part of the apartment or apartments, and the other shall be placed in the forward portion of the apartment or apartments, and one of them shall have an exhausting cap to carry off the foul air, and the other a receiving cap to carry down the fresh air; which said ventilators shall have a capacity proportioned to the size of the apartment or apartments to be purified, namely: if the apartment or apartments will lawfully authorize the reception of two hundred such passengers, the capacity of such ventilators shall each be equal to a tube of twelve inches diameter in the clear, and in proportion for larger or smaller apartments; and all said ventilators shall rise at least four feet six inches above the upper deck of any such vessel, and be of the most approved form and construction; but if it shall appear, from the report to be made and approved, as hereinafter provided, that such vessel is equally well ventilated by any other means, such other means of ventilation shall be deemed and held to be a compliance with the provisions of this section.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That every vessel carrying more than fifty such passengers shall have for their use on deck, housed and conveniently arranged, at least one camboose or cooking range, the dimensions of which shall be equal to four feet long and one foot six inches wide for every two hundred passengers; and provision shall be made in the manner aforesaid, in this ratio, for a greater or less number of passengers; but nothing herein contained shall take away the right to make such arrangements for cooking between decks, if that shall be deemed desirable.

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That all vessels employed as aforesaid shall have on board, for the use of such passengers, at the time of leaving the last port whence such vessels shall sail, well secured under deck, for each passenger, at least twenty pounds of good navy bread, fifteen pounds of rice, fifteen pounds of oat-meal, ten pounds of wheat flour, fifteen pounds of peas and beans, twenty pounds of potatoes, one pint of vinegar, sixty gallons of fresh water, ten pounds of salt beef, free of bone, all to be of good quality; but at places where either rice, oat-meal, wheat flour, or peas and beans cannot be procured of good quality and on reasonable terms, the quantity of either or any of the last named articles may be increased and substituted therefor; and, in case potatoes cannot be procured on reasonable terms, one pound of either of said articles may be substituted in lieu of five pounds of potatoes; and the captains of such vessels shall deliver to each passenger at least one tenth part of the aforesaid provisions weekly, commencing on the day of sailing, and at least three quarts of water daily; and if the passengers on board of any such vessel in which the provisions and water herein required shall not have been provided as aforesaid, shall at any time be put on short allowance during any voyage, the master or owner of any such vessel shall pay to each and every passenger who shall have been put on short allowance, the sum of three dollars for each and every day they may have been put on short allowance, to be recovered in the circuit or district court of the United States; and it shall be the duty of the captains or master of every such ship or vessel to cause the food and provisions of all the passengers to be well and properly cooked daily, and to be served out and distributed to them at regular and stated hours by messes, or in such other manner as shall be deemed best and most conducive to the health and comfort of such passengers, of which hours and manner of distribution due and sufficient notice shall be given. If the captain or master of any such ship or vessel shall willfully fail to furnish and distribute such provisions, cooked as aforesaid, he shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof before any circuit or district court of the United States, shall be fined not more than one thousand dollars, and shall be imprisoned for a term not exceeding one year: Provided, That the enforcement of this penalty shall not affect the civil responsibility of the captain, or master and owners, to such passengers as may have suffered from said default.

SEC. 7. And be it further enacted, That the captain of any such vessel so employed is hereby authorized to maintain good discipline and such habits of cleanliness among such passengers as will tend to the preservation and promotion of health; and to that end he shall cause such regulations as he may adopt for this purpose to be posted up, before sailing, on board such vessel, in a place accessible to such passengers, and shall keep the same so posted up during the voyage; and it is hereby made the duty of said captain to cause the apartments occupied by such passengers to be kept at all times in a clean, healthy state; and the owners of every such vessel so employed are required to construct the decks, and all parts of said apartment, so that it can be thoroughly cleansed; and they shall also provide a safe, convenient privy or water-closet for the exclusive use of every one hundred such passengers. And when the weather is such that said passengers cannot be mustered on deck with their bedding, it shall be the duty of the captain of every such vessel to cause the deck occupied by such passengers to be cleansed with chloride of lime, or some other equally efficient disinfecting agent, and also at such other times as said captain may deem necessary.

SEC. 8. And be it further enacted, That the master and owner or owners of any such vessel so employed, which shall not be provided with the house or houses over the passage ways as prescribed in the third section of this chapter, or with ventilators, as prescribed in the fourth section of this chapter, or with the cambooses or cooking ranges, with the houses over them, as prescribed in the fifth section of this chapter, shall severally forfeit and pay to the United States the sum of two hundred dollars for each and every violation of, or neglect to conform to, the provisions of each of said sections; and fifty dollars for each and every neglect or violation of any of the provisions of the seventh section of this chapter, to be recovered by suit in any circuit or district court of the United States, within the jurisdiction of which the said vessel may arrive, or from which she may be about to depart, or at any place within the jurisdiction of such courts, wherever the owner or owners, or captain, of such vessel may be found.

SEC. 9. And be it further enacted, That the collector of the customs at any port of the United States at which any vessel so employed shall arrive, or from which any such vessel shall be about to depart, shall appoint and direct one or more of the inspectors of the customs for such port to examine such vessel, and report, in writing, to such collector whether the requirements of law have been complied with in respect to such vessel; and if such report shall state such compliance, and shall be approved by such collector, it shall be deemed and held as prima facie evidence thereof.

SEC. 10. And be it further enacted, That the provisions, requisitions, penalties, and liens of this act, relating to the space in vessels appropriated to the use of passengers, are hereby extended and made applicable to all spaces appropriated to the use of steerage passengers in vessels propelled in whole or in part by steam, and navigating from, to, and between the ports, and in manner as in this act named, and to such vessels and to the masters thereof; and so much of the act entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to provide for the better security of the lives of passengers on board of vessels propelled in whole or in part by steam, and for other purposes,'" approved August thirtieth, eighteen hundred and fifty-two, as conflicts with this act, is hereby repealed; and the space appropriated to the use of steerage passengers in vessels so as above propelled and navigated, is hereby subject to the supervision and inspection of the collector of the customs at any port of the United States at which any such vessel shall arrive, or from which she shall be about to depart; and the same shall be examined and reported in the same manner, and by the same officers by the next preceding section directed to examine and report.

SEC. 11. And be it further enacted, That the vessels bound from any port in the United States to any port or place in the Pacific ocean, or on its tributaries, or from any such port or place to any port in the United States on the Atlantic or its tributaries, shall be subject to the foregoing provisions regulating the carriage of passengers in merchant vessels, except so much as relates to provisions and water; but the owners and masters of all such vessels shall in all cases furnish to each passenger the daily supply of water therein mentioned; and they shall furnish a sufficient supply of good and wholesome food, properly cooked; and in case they shall fail so to do, or shall provide unwholesome or unsuitable provisions, they shall be subject to the penalty provided in the sixth section of this chapter, in case the passengers are put on short allowance of water or provisions.

SEC. 12. And be it further enacted, That the captain or master of any ship or vessel arriving in the United States, or any of the Territories thereof, from any foreign place whatever, at the same time that he delivers a manifest of the cargo, and if there be no cargo, then at the time of making report or entry of the ship or vessel, pursuant to law, shall also deliver and report to the collector of the district in which such ship or vessel shall arrive, a list or manifest of all the passengers taken on board of the said ship or vessel at any foreign port or place; in which list or manifest it shall be the duty of the said master to designate, particularly, the age, sex, and occupation of the said passengers, respectively, the part of the vessel occupied by each during the voyage, the country to which they severally belong, and that of which it is their intention to become inhabitants; and shall further set forth whether any, and what number, have died on the voyage; which list or manifest shall be sworn to by the said master, in the same manner as directed by law in relation to the manifest of the cargo, and the refusal or neglect of the master aforesaid to comply with the provisions of this section, or any part thereof, shall incur the same penalties, disabilities, and forfeitures as are provided for a refusal or neglect to report and deliver a manifest of the cargo aforesaid.

SEC. 13. And be it further enacted, That each and every collector of the customs to whom such manifest, or list of passengers as aforesaid, shall be delivered, shall quarter-yearly return copies thereof to the Secretary of State of the United States, by whom statements of the same shall be laid before Congress at each and every session.

SEC. 14. And be it further enacted, That in case there shall have occurred, on board any ship or vessel arriving at any port or place within the United States or its Territories, any death or deaths among the passengers, (other than cabin passengers,) the master, or captain, or owner, or consignee of such ship or vessel, shall, within twenty-four hours after the time within which the report and list or manifest of passengers mentioned in section twelve of this act, is required to be delivered to the collector of the customs, pay to the said collector the sum of ten dollars for each and every passenger above the age of eight years who shall have died on the voyage by natural disease; and the said collector shall pay the money thus received at such times and in such manner as the Secretary of the Treasury, by general rules, shall direct, to any board or commission appointed by and acting under the authority of the State within which the port where such ship or vessel arrived is situated, for the care and protection of sick, indigent, or destitute emigrants, to be applied to the objects of their appointment; and if there be more than one board or commission who shall claim such payment, the Secretary of the Treasury, for the time being, shall determine which is entitled to receive the same, and his decision in the premises shall be final and without appeal: Provided, That the payment shall, in no case, be awarded or made to any board or commission, or association formed for the protection or advancement of any particular class of immigrants, or emigrants of any particular nation or creed; and if the master, captain, owner, or consignee of any ship or vessel refuse or neglect to pay to the collector the sum and sums of money required, and within the time prescribed by this section, he or they shall severally forfeit and pay the sum of fifty dollars in addition to such sum of ten dollars for each and every passenger upon whose death the same has become payable, to be recovered by the United States in any circuit or district court of the United States where such vessel may arrive, or such master, captain, owner, or consignee may reside; and when recovered the said money shall be disposed of in the same manner as is directed with respect to the sum and sums required to be paid to the collector of customs.

SEC. 15. And be it further enacted, That the amount of the several penalties imposed by the foregoing provisions regulating the carriage of passengers in merchant vessels, shall be liens on the vessel or vessels violating those provisions, and such vessel or vessels shall be libeled therefor in any circuit or district court of the United States where such vessel or vessels shall arrive.

SEC. 16. And be it further enacted, That all and every vessel or vessels which shall or may be employed by the American Colonization Society, or the Colonization Society of any State to transport, and which shall actually transport, from any port or ports of the United States to any colony or colonies on the west coast of Africa, colored emigrants to reside there, shall be, and the same are hereby, subjected to the operation of the foregoing provisions regulating the carriage of passengers in merchant vessels.

SEC. 17. And be it further enacted, That the collector of the customs shall examine each emigrant ship or vessel on its arrival at his port, and ascertain and report to the Secretary of the Treasury at the time of sailing, the length of the voyage, the ventilation, the number of passengers, their space on board, their food, the native country of the emigrants, the number of deaths, the age and sex of those who died during the voyage, together with his opinion of the cause of the mortality, if any, on board, and if none, what precautionary measures, arrangements, or habits, are supposed to have had any, and what, agency in causing the exemption.

SEC. 18. And be it further enacted, That this act shall take effect, with respect to vessels sailing from ports in the United States on the eastern side of the continent, within thirty days from the time of its approval; and with respect to vessels sailing from ports in the United States on the western side of the continent, and from ports in Europe, within sixty days from the time of its approval; and with respect to vessels sailing from ports in other parts of the world, within six months from the time of its approval. And it is hereby made the duty of the Secretary of State to give notice, in the ports of Europe and elsewhere, of this act, in such manner as he shall deem proper.

SEC. 19. And be it further enacted, That from and after the time that this act shall take effect with respect to any vessels, then in respect to such vessels, the act of second March, eighteen hundred and nineteen, entitled "An act regulating passenger ships and vessels," the act of twenty-second of February, eighteen hundred and forty-seven, entitled "An act to regulate the carriage of passengers in merchant vessels," the act of second March, eighteen hundred and forty-seven, entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to regulate the carriage of passengers in merchant vessels,' and to determine the time when said act shall take effect," the act of thirty-first January, eighteen hundred and forty-eight, entitled "An act exempting vessels employed by the American Colonization Society in transporting colored emigrants from the United States to the coast of Africa from the provisions of the acts of the twenty-second February and second of March, eighteen hundred and forty-seven, regulating the carriage of passengers in merchant vessels," the act of seventeenth May, eighteen hundred and forty-eight, entitled "An act to provide for the ventilation of passenger vessels, and for other purposes," and the act of third March, eighteen hundred and forty-nine, entitled "An act to extend the provisions of all laws now in force relating to the carriage of passengers in merchant vessels, and the regulation thereof," are hereby repealed. But nothing in this act contained shall in any wise obstruct or prevent the prosecution, recovery, distribution, or remission of any fines, penalties, or forfeitures which may have been incurred in respect to any vessels prior to the day this act goes into effect, in respect to such vessels, under the laws hereby repealed, for which purpose the said laws shall continue in force. But the Secretary of the Treasury may, in his discretion, and upon such conditions as he shall think proper, discontinue any such prosecutions, or remit or modify such penalties.

APPROVED, March 3, 1855.
